Crumbs of Comfort

Men like to lean on the true and brave.

Prosperity gains friends and adversity tries them.

Money like manure does no good until it is spread.

A diet of dime novels will make a pirate of any boy.

The Christian life is like an eagle in the sunlight above the clouds.

When a man is cross-eyed in his morals you can't tell which way he is going.

It is well to overtake people in their faults, but they should not be trampled on afterwards.

One fault of a deserving man will meet with more reproaches than all his virtues will win praise.

It is the infirmity of small minds to be taken with every appearance and dazzled by everything that sparkles.

A wise man will desire no more than he may get justly, use soberly, distribute cheerfully and live upon contentedly.

The devil is afraid of a church that has a praying congregation behind its pastor and does not bother much about the other kind.

The poor must not exceed their means, but the poorest have means enough to indulge in a little luxury occasionally and it is good to do so.

Not to be provoked is best, but if moved, never correct till the anger is spent, for every stroke our fury strikes is sure to hit ourselves at last.

Miracles are good, but to relieve a brother, to draw a friend from the depths of misery, to pardon the virtues of our enemies, these are greater than miracles.

The Station Matron Observes

By Josephine Page Wright

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

Is it that you have never seen an angel? But there is something wrong with the heart of you, for I have seen. Your eyes are young, and mine are very old. You have traveled in many lands, and I have been nowhere. All day I sit here in the railroad station and I knit and I knit. I comfort the troubles of the people who are always coming or always going and I watch for angels.

Is it that you look for a creature in white with great flopping wings and a halo of yellow hair? Poof. An angel was here yesterday, sitting there in the seat next the stove. It was no pale creature with floppy wings. It wore a white knit bonnet with a red bow on top and a red and yellow knit scarf about its little shoulders. The hair of it was black as a raven's wing.

I knit and I knit with my eyes upon my work. But it is that a station-matron must know what she does not see. First of all came two women, a young woman and an old woman and both were splendidly rich and unhappy. The Younger seemed to carry the burden of a grief, but the Older only its shadow. They sat beside me here and began to talk in heavy tones and without thought of me.

"It does not seem real," said The Younger.

"It is not real," pronounced the other, "because it is not right."

"That is a cold philosophy. It does not warm me in this. At least the vulgarity of it is real enough. Strange that the vulgarity appals me more than the thought of separation," wondered the other bitterly.

"Does he know?" asked The Older.

"By this time I suppose. I left him a note. It will not trouble him. He has ceased to care. We bore one another. I almost wish there had been a scandal. It would have been easier.

It is that I have heard the story often here in the noisy station and sometimes the angels are sent; sometimes they do not come. But these women were good to look at and somehow different and I knit harder and I prayed for the angels.

In at the door trailed a tired Mexican woman with a crying baby in her arms. She dragged across the room and sat down opposite the other women. It was that the matron should have taken the baby and rested the tired mother but something told me to knit and to wait.

When the baby did not stop but whimpered and whined, the little mother began to cry softly too, wiping her eyes on a corner of the baby's scarf. And the two women who had been there first began to notice a sorrow that was not their own. I saw The Younger cross and touch the little mother on the arm and ask to take the baby.

"If you would, senora," consented the relieved woman. "We have lost its father. I have tried to find him but the baby is very heavy."

The little Mexican hurried away and left the two women with the stranger-baby.

"He is a pretty baby," commented The Younger.

"You have never thought babies pretty," reminded The Older.

And even I, who can see angels when others do not, wondered a little. For what baby is pretty when it is red and wrinkled with weeping?

Strangely enough after a time the child ceased to cry and fell asleep in the arms of The Younger.

"Mother," demanded The Younger, "is the skin of every baby so soft and white?"

The other smiled. "Your skin was softer and white, far."

"Mother," asked The Younger, "does every baby cling to one's finger with cunning hands?"

"You," smiled The Older, "always clung to my thumb as you fell asleep at the breast."

"At the breast," echoed The Younger softly. "It is a beautiful child, mother. See its feet. Look, the great toe sticks straight up and the little toes curl down."

"All your toes curled down," answered The Older proudly.

"The more monkey I," laughed The Younger.

I peeped from my knitting and saw the grief lifting like a veil from her face.

"But what makes me feel as I do toward the little one? Is it because——?"

"I have thought so," whispered The Older, "for some time now."

For an instant the veil was lifted clear from the face. Then it fell back in thicker clouds than before.

"It is too late. I could have endured his indifference. I cannot now face his contemptuous anger," she resigned herself.

For an hour the baby slept in the arms of The Younger and no word was spoken. At the end of that time a man with white stern face came in hurriedly. He opposed the woman with the sleeping baby in her arms. But he saw only the woman.

"You shall come home with me. Am I a man of wood to let you go? Has the frivolity of our lives made you think of me as a puppet? You shall go because I love you. I want you."

"I shall go because I am glad to go," she contradicted with quiet dignity. "I have been turned back by a messenger."

"Back from Eden," he scowled, "by the flaming sword of conscience."

"Back to Eden," she corrected, "by the angel of annunciation."

It was that I should stop my knitting and take the ugly little angel and hold it in my arms until its mother came back.

Monthly Lesson in History

NOVEMBER glided from its position as the ninth month in the old Roman calendar to eleventh place in the modern calendar without undergoing any change of name. Originally it consisted of thirty days, was reduced to twenty-nine, enlarged to thirty-one by Julius Cæsar, and shortened to thirty during the reign of Augustus, since which time that has been its length. In olden times the month was an important one in the religious rituals, but in later days the only feast days retained are All Saints and St. Andrews. On the first Tuesday following the first Monday of the month many of the states hold their general elections. Shooting stars are seen in greatest number during this month, the showers of meteors generally falling on the 13th and 14th. The gem stone symbolic of the month is the topaz, standing for friendship, happiness. The November flower is the chrysanthemum, which, according to the color, is emblematic of loveliness, cheerfulness or truth. Sad is the song of the poets, who note the approach of the death of the year. "No shade, no shine, no butterflies, no bees, no fruit, no flowers, no leaves, no birds," says Hood in mournful cadence, while the others are little more cheerful: "Chill November's surly blast," says Burns; "The bleak November winds," Bryant; "Dark November," Ruskin; "Dark November days," Moore; "Wild November," Stoddard. Generally throughout England the month is regarded as the month of "blue devils and suicides," owing no doubt to the depressing influence of the leaden skies, choking fogs, torrents of rain and gusts of wind.

Thanksgiving Day always adds a note of good cheer to November. Thanksgiving Day has been celebrated in this country ever since the gathering of the first harvest in the Plymouth colony, and ever since the third year of the Civil War it has been observed religiously by the several states and nations. Prior to President Lincoln's proclamation, various dates in November have been observed; but since that the last Thursday of the month has been generally set apart as the day upon which to return thanks for manifold blessings. However, it has happened that when the month contains five Thursdays there is some confusion. Several years ago the state of Oregon observed both the fourth and fifth Thursdays as Thanksgiving Day—and both days were legal holidays, one by proclamation of the President and the other by order of the Governor of the state. The observance of a Thanksgiving Day was recommended annually by Congress during the Revolution.

Principal events throughout history have been as follows day by day.

1st—One of the most terrible earthquakes ever recorded in history occurred in 1755, when Lisbon was destroyed and 60,000 persons lost their lives.

2nd—In the same year, Marie Antoinette, queen of Louis XVI was born; Edward, Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria, born 1767. President James K. Polk, born 1795.

3rd—Congress of Vienna opened for the settlement of Europe, 1814; William Cullen Bryant, born 1794.

4th—Mendelssohn, German musical composer, died 1847; William III, King of England, born 1650; William, Prince of Orange, married his cousin, Princess Mary of York, 1677—one of the collateral causes leading to the downfall of the Stuart dynasty.

5th—Guy Fawkes day in England; discovery and prevention of the "Gunpowder Plot," 1605; marked the inauguration of the English Revolution of 1688; Russians defeated at Crimea, 1854; "King of France" dropped in 1800 as one of the royal English titles and thereafter the royal correspondence was conducted in the English instead of the French language.

6th—Louis Joseph Philip, Duke of Orleans, guillotined at Paris 1793.

7th—Battle of Tippecanoe.

8th—John Milton, English poet, died 1764.

9th—Napoleon seized power, 1799.

10th—Mohammed, Arabian prophet, born 570; Martin Luther, born 1483; Oliver Goldsmith, born 1728; Schiller, born 1759; The Mayflower anchored in Cape Cod harbor, 1620; first white child born in Plymouth.

13th—Justinian, Roman emperor, died 565. The years 1831-33 were marked by a magnificent display of shooting stars.

14th—Napoleon at the Battle of Arcola, 1796.

15th—Wm. Cowper, poet, born 1731. Sherman started upon his memorable march to the sea.

16th—Tiberius, Roman emperior, born 42 B. C.

18th—President Chester A. Arthur, died 1886.

19th—Charles I of England, born 1600. President James A. Garfield, born 1831. Schubert, musical composer, died 1828.

20th—Thomas Chatterton, poet, born 1752.

22nd—Robert Lord Clive, founder of the British Empire in India, died 1774.

23rd—Elbridge Gerry, fifth vice-president, died 1814. President Franklin Pierce, died 1804.

24th—President Zachary Taylor, born 1784. Grace Darling, heroine, born 1815.

25th—Isaac Watts, writer of hymns, died 1748.

27th—This is the earliest possible date upon which Advent Sunday can fall, as it did in 1864. Horace, lyric poet, died 8 B. C.

28th—Washington Irving, died 1859.

29th—First newspaper printed on presses operated by steam, 1814. President Andrew Johnson, born 1808.

"A CHRISTMAS MAKESHIFT"

This splendid story, written in Joseph Novak's best style, is full of human interest, breathing the Christmas spirit, and through it is woven a very pretty romance of true love in which Santa Claus helps Cupid to the conquest of a fair one's heart. Don't miss this, all complete, in devised and recently exhibited in Washington, D. C., by ladies of the highest social and official circle of the capital city to encourage a larger use of cotton goods for dressy occasions as well as for everyday wear, by showing the possibilities of dressmaking art in producing a variety of beautiful and serviceable gowns for all purposes made exclusively of cotton fabrics. Prominent ladies, who took part, and the costumes they wore will be described and pictured, as well as other interesting and instructive facts concerning this unique exhibition. High society has set the fashion to dress in cotton and every woman will want to learn how to follow the style in good taste by reading our valuable article in December COMFORT. HOTEL AND STORE WHERE BRET HARTE BOARDED.

Though these two illustrations picturing scenes rendered famous by two noted American authors have no connection with the November History Lesson we print them here for lack of more appropriate association.

The brick building that was once used as his headquarters by Bret Harte and in which he is supposed to have penned the famous lines, "For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, the heathen Chinee is peculiar," is still standing in a good state of preservation at Langworth, California. The building served the double purpose of hotel and store and entertained many visitors in the early days, when Langworth was the only trading point in that portion of the valley. Not far away stands the old schoolhouse and church, which both Bret Harte and Mark Twain used as settings for numerous of their stories.

EDITORIAL

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

One cycle more, with rich fruition crowned,
Hastes to fulfillment of its perfect round,—
Great year of wonder, and of vast emprise!
For all its gifts, ay, let Thanksgiving rise,
The hero's prowess—bloodless victory won;
The martyr's patience, sternest duty done,—
Yet loftier peans still, for war's surcease,—
For God's best gift,—the precious boon of peace!

IF ever the United States had reason and cause for Thanksgiving, it certainly has in this year of grace, above all other years since those stirring days when in 1621 a song of rejoicing went up from the Mayflower group to the Creator for all His benefits and mercies. We can thank a kindly Providence that two mighty oceans roll on either side of us separating our land from the warring nations of Europe and Asia, and that consequently we are at peace. For the present, at least, we need not lie awake nights or slumber fitfully, ever haunted, as are some of the peoples of Europe, by the fear that tremendous war ships of the air may drop explosive bombs on our defenseless homes.

Fortunate are we that as a whole our country is not yet over-populated, though at the present rate of immigration it soon will be and will then suffer the resulting miseries that oppress Europe and are the real bottom cause of the present great war; that as a nation we still have land enough to be self-sustaining and have no fear of famine, not even if our coasts should be blockaded and our commerce cut off by an enemy or coalition of enemies in war.

Not only should we rejoice that our geographical position is an impediment to sudden invasions by any of the great military powers, but we may add another note to our pean of praise, inasmuch as the Panama Canal, now completed, largely increases the effective strength of our navy and lessens the danger of Japanese aggression still to be feared and guarded against.

There is no danger of our country becoming involved as an active participant in the titanic strife that is desolating Europe and sucking Asia, Africa and the isles of the seas into its bloody vortex, although we necessarily suffer some of the consequences of the war in its depressing effect on our commerce and industries.

Finally let us be devoutly thankful for the bounteous crops with which Providence has rewarded the labors of our farmers in their peaceful conquest of Nature while unhappy Europe has been, and still is, reaping a hideous harvest of death and destruction and, worst of all, fiendish demoralization and barbarism.

United States Should Profit by the War

NOT that we would seek to prosper by the woe and anguish of other peoples—God forbid—but a condition not of our making or choosing has arisen which not merely presents the opportunity but forces on us the necessity of making for ourselves and for export to foreign countries many products which we and they have heretofore been accustomed to buy in other markets. This will work greatly to our advantage as soon as our agricultural, industrial and commercial interests adjust themselves to meet the calls of the new situation.

The first effect of the war was to disturb finances and unsettle commercial and industrial conditions in the United States.

Naturally our commerce with the countries involved in the war has suffered a heavy decline; and this applies to both imports and exports Germany and Austria are so completely blockaded by land and sea that practically nothing, enters or leaves either of those countries, while all business, except that pertaining to war, is nearly at a standstill in the other belligerent nations.

The result is that temporarily there is little if any market in those countries for the goods which we usually sell them, except grain and other food stuffs for which the war has increased the demand and raised the price; thereby benefiting our farmers immediately. Unfortunately our apple growers and cotton planters are not in this category, for the war has cut off the foreign demand for both these products this fall, resulting in unprofitably low prices, a market restricted to home consumption, and a considerable surplus—both crops being exceptionally large—that cannot be disposed of at present.

As a further effect there is a scarcity and an advance in price of such manufactured articles and raw materials as we depend on these countries to furnish us, which in turn embarrasses some of our industries that use these imported raw materials.

But what we lose here temporarily we are likely to more than make up in another direction through the immediate opening of new markets to our products which will largely increase our foreign trade.

The countries of South America have heretofore sold most of their products, and bought the larger part of the manufactured goods that they use, in England, Germany, France and Belgium, but since the war has interrupted their trade with Europe they are looking to the United States for a market in which to buy and sell.

While Europe is fighting, the United States has a splendid opportunity to develop a trade with South America worth hundreds of millions of dollars annually, and to establish it on a permanent and growing basis. In so doing we shall only be coming into possession of our own, for the channels of commerce naturally run north and south rather than east and west, and it is fitting and will be mutually advantageous for the sister republics of the western hemisphere to gravitate toward closer trade relations, which will also tend to a better understanding and more friendly feeling between their peoples. This, together with a more complete severance from old world interests, entanglements and intrigues, should become a factor for assuring to the two Americas universal and enduring peace based on far stronger bonds than those of treaties which, as we have seen shamelessly instanced in the present conflict, may be so slightly regarded and easily broken.

Yet another legitimate advantage of vast importance will accrue to the United States perforce of the war. We are running short of many necessary manufactured articles, more especially in the line of drugs, dyes and chemicals, for the supply of which we have depended entirely on Europe and mostly on Germany. Our source of supply is now cut off, and if the war lasts but a few months longer we shall feel the lack severely. We could make all these articles, perhaps not so cheaply at first but just as well, right at home, and the war will compel us to do so and to begin at once.

Thus many new and large industries giving employment to thousands of workmen will spring up among us and put in circulation among our own people millions of dollars in wages instead of sending the money abroad to pay for foreign made goods. Furthermore this will make us more nearly a self-sustaining nation, the vital importance of which the present war has taught us.

So, if our manufacturers and merchants are enterprising, the war will bring an era of unprecedented progress, development and prosperity in the United States,—and now is the eve of its beginning.

The Panama Canal, which opened for business last August, should prove helpful to this end, but we also need a large merchant marine including regular lines of steamships to the principal South American ports. And another good result of the war is that it has impressed Congress with the necessity of encouraging the building of American ships by liberal laws and reasonable subsidies.

In 1826, ninety per cent of our trade was carried by our own ships, while today all but eight per cent is transported in foreign bottoms. None are so blind as those who will not see. The majority of our Congressmen for years have been bitterly opposed to the adoption of any measures that would place our flag on the great waterways of the world. Only a world-wide cataclysm can open the eyes of some people to national necessities which are only too apparent to others of broader vision, who, having the welfare of the nation at heart, fail to see the necessity of paying Europe $300,000,000 a year for the carrying of our exports in foreign ships.

A large and efficient merchant marine was never more vitally necessary than now, when the world is crying out for our products, and war has made it hazardous, or almost impossible to transport them in ships of the belligerent powers.

When this battling of the nations is over and the exhausted peoples of the earth cry out for food and clothing, for succor and comfort, America will be ready with open hands to supply all needs, and to help bind up the wounds of the suffering, and it is our earnest hope that the material assistance that we can in the day of necessity render the stricken peoples of the old world will be carried into their harbors in our own ships.

We can never be a truly independent nation in peace or war until we have a merchant marine of our own, built in American shipyards, owned by American citizens and sailed under the stars and stripes, adequate to the needs of our commerce.

Our Foreign-Patent Law Needs Immediate Reform

WE should not be in such a fix in regard to most of the foreign-made dyes, drugs and chemicals but for the stupid and unjust provisions of our laws relating to the issuance of American patent rights to foreign inventors.

Our patent laws permit a foreigner, who has patented his invention in his own country, to take out a patent in the United States giving him exclusive rights in this country. Foreign countries accord the same privilege to American inventors, with this important difference, however. Germany, for intance, requires an American inventor, to whom a German patent is issued, to begin manufacturing the patented article in Germany within a specified time (two or three years), and if he does not do so the patent becomes void and after that anybody is free to make and sell the article in Germany. That is the wise and just condition on which all German patents are granted.

Our law imposes no such conditions and the result is that the German inventor takes out his American patent and never manufactures the article on this side of the Atlantic. His American patent gives him a monopoly of the American market for the goods which he manufactures in Germany.

Because of this inexcusable fault of our patent laws these articles of foreign invention, protected by American patents, are not now being made in the United States, and as the war has shut off their importation from abroad we are suffering for need of them, and if obtainable at all the price has risen to anywhere from one hundred to two or three thousand per cent. And the worst of it is, that until our patent laws are changed, we are not allowed to make these foreign-invented articles for ourselves no matter how difficult, expensive or even impossible it may be to obtain them from abroad.

Some of these patented drugs and chemicals that are made only in Europe are absolute necessaries, and Congress should at once change our patent law so to enable us to make them ourselves to supply our own needs if the foreign inventor will not or cannot do so. Self-preservation is the first law of nature and should have due weight with our senators and congressmen in drafting our statutes.

Troublesome Mexico

NOW that he is rid of the abnoxious Huerta whom he would not recognize as President of Mexico, President Wilson finds himself in equally hot water trying to reconcile the strife between his two proteges, Carranza and Villa, who now show little, if any, more respect for the rights and dignity of the United States than did other despicable marauders that in the successive insurrections have paraded as Mexican patriots. They are repeating the same outrages that have made their partizan warfare an insufferable international nuisance. In a recent battle between the Caranza and Villa armies they have fired over the border into a Texas town and, according to the Associated Press report, have wounded one U. S. soldier and at least one private citizen, both of whom were minding their own business on Texas soil where our flag and national authority should have protected them.

Although our government cautioned the Mexicans not to repeat these lawless acts we have heard of no demand for reparation nor for the punishment of the offenders.

Will our government thus lightly pass over such outrageous violations of our territory and the rights of our citizens on our side of the border?

Is the shooting up of a Texas town by Mexican soldiers a less serious affair than the little flag incident which impelled President Wilson to send our naval forces to Vera Cruz and take forcible possession of that city?

We abhor war and would deplore a repetition of the Vera Cruz fiasco which should have been pushed to the accomplishment of some adequate result or else never have been undertaken at all, yet we believe that the "watchful waiting" do-nothing policy which permits frequent and numerous flagrant outrages against our citizens and our sovereignty by Mexican officials to go unpunished brings our government into such contempt in Mexico as will ultimately involve us in war.

Buy Your Christmas Goods Where You Get Best Values

Save money by buying your Christmas presents through COMFORT advertisers.

Consider the advantages:

In the first place—ECONOMY. That's important this year—every year. Firms that advertise develop such an enormous volume of business they can afford to sell goods for less money than those which do not advertise.

In the second place—better, fresher goods and a better selection. Through COMFORT advertisers and by studying the catalogues they send, you can get the pick of the world's goods. You are put on an equality with the people who live in America's largest cities. There is nothing you cannot buy.

In the third place—absolutely satisfactory dealing. When you do business with a mail-order house you KNOW you will get a square deal. Their business has been built on the policy of satisfying the customer. It is by doing business this way that they prosper.

You want your Christmas money this year to go as far as it will—to buy the best presents.

And remember one thing particularly—the BEST presents are always USEFUL presents. Don't forget this fact, as you go through COMFORT this month, reading the stories and studying the advertisements.

Consider what you can give that will give the most pleasure—by being the most useful. Then send off for catalogues or order from the advertisements.

Study your buying this Christmas.

Get the best possible value for your money by ordering through the advertisers who use COMFORT.

Send for your catalogues NOW—begin ordering EARLY.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

WHEN our Puritan forefathers set apart a day in which to give thanks to God for His mercies, they little knew they were establishing a custom that bids fair to last for all time; though I fear much of its true significance has been lost in the rush of the present day.

It is not of the one day that I wish to speak, but of the three hundred and sixty-four remaining days which should be days of thanksgiving just as much as the one set apart by the Governor, for surely we know better than he what we have to be thankful for.

By this I do not mean that we are to go around with a solemn visage, chanting our thanks in a loud voice. Far be it from me to presume on any greater knowledge than that possessed by the average human being but I have a deep-seated conviction that such hypocritical prayers do not ascend any higher than the minds of the selfish individuals who utter them. It is a case of where "actions speak louder than words," and if we have any cause to be thankful (and who has not) do you not think, sisters, and any who read this, that the true way of expressing such thanks would be in sharing your blessings with some less fortunate person than yourself? I leave it to you, as individuals, to make use of and share the "talents" God has given you and may we all hear on that last day, His "well done, thou good and faithful servant."—Ed.

ELLIJAY, R. R. 2, Box 79, GA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you kindly make room for a north Georgia sister, for a cozy chat? I am a little woman, therefore will not need much room. I will leave my ten-year-old boy and five small girls playing outside as they might offend someone with their "racket," as they are all full of life and believe in having a good time, all the time.

Our principal crop is corn, although wheat, rye and oats are raised.

North Georgia apples are unexcelled. In fact most all fruits and vegetables grow well here. We supply our table with vegetables from our garden from early spring until frost.

One seldom sees a well as most everyone builds near a spring of pure, clear, cold water, which never gives out. Our greatest drawback is bad roads, especially in winter.

My mother has been a subscriber of COMFORT for a number of years and we do not intend to do without it.

Much has been said about the style of dress, but I cannot help saying a few words on that subject. Why will women dress in such an outrageous way. When I see a girl hobbling along, can scarcely put one foot before the other, I almost wish a mad dog would get after her. God has given me free use of limbs and body and I thank Him that I have sense enough not to deprive myself of the use of them.

I did not intend to write a letter but ask if any of COMFORT'S many readers ever knew of a baby having a blood tumor on its head and what came of it? Has any one known of one being successfully operated on, or one disappearing just within itself? Do you think it might cause pain or suffering? When my baby was a few days old I saw three tiny red specks which commenced growing when she was about two months old. It got about the size of a small egg and has not grown any more, it is about an inch from the crown of the head, on one side. It has never hurt her in the least. She has been very healthy but grows so little. I feel that there must surely be a cause. She is fourteen months old and weighs eighteen pounds. She has not gained an ounce in several months. I have an abundance of nourishment for her and feed her some too. I would be most grateful if anyone would write me concerning the tumor.

May Mr. Gannett, Uncle Charlie and our dear Mrs. Wilkinson live long to continue their good work. They surely will have many stars in their crowns.

With good wishes to everyone of you, I am,
Your COMFORT sister, MRS. W. H. GUDGER.

Mrs. Gudger. I have never known of a case similar to your baby's and if you learn of any remedy I would suggest that you consult a physician before using. Even if he could not determine the beneficial effect it would have, he could, at least, advise you if it possessed any dangerous properties and it is always best not to take any chances.—Ed.

MT. OLIVET, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

You were kind to my letter a few years ago and deemed it worthy of print. I have thought I would write again, but I was misunderstood before and it has made me timid. I will try, at this late day and rectify the mistake; I said I thought from some of the sisters' talk they did not think it necessary to have churches and be a member; could live Christians at home. I answered I thought it very necessary to attend church to live the Christ life; and our editor said there were many Christians who never were permitted to attend church. She and I agree, only she did not understand me. Of course there are many in too poor health to attend church or who live too far away; but what I meant was that those who were able and lived close to a church should attend. Enough of this subject as I think you will understand me now.

I enjoy COMFORT. Some say they do not see how they could live without it. I do not intend to try. A word regarding renewals. Sometimes we fail to renew, not because we do not want COMFORT but in our eagerness to see inside we fail to see the number that means the last.

How much I would love to meet the COMFORT staff. I feel they are near kin and to read after them is like a letter from some dear one; how is it possible to get so many good and noble Christians to edit one paper, I cannot understand.

I will have to say a word regarding what Cousin Marion said in June paper. "It seems that boys have to sow their wild oats." If boys would stop to think that the result of sowing was a harvest they surely would not sow. If we sow we reap, we reap more than we sow and others reap what we sow. How many times do broken-hearted mothers, wives and even children, sisters and friends have to help reap a harvest some thoughtless boy has sown. I hope all boys who read this will never sow any more "wild oats" for loved ones to help them reap.

I have a few helps then I will close.

Anyone wanting a sleeping porch and not having the porch but having a shed kitchen can make one on top of kitchen. It does not require much lumber, just a platform and that does not need to be solid; screen or poultry wire to screen it in and for a canopy buy unbleached cotton. If this is not plain to anyone I will, if they send stamp, give more information.

To keep soda from streaking, first put soda in hand then salt and rub well together.

Where one has a small clothes closet, they can economize space by using a hoop covered with cotton and pin waists and dresses to it.

With best wishes to COMFORT'S staff and its readers,
MRS. CHARLOTTIE DAY.

Mrs. Day. I am glad you had the courage to make yourself understood; in fact, it would seem that the matter was a double misunderstanding and I fully apologize for my part of it.

Just why people think a boy must sow his wild oats is something I have never been able to understand, particularly when the result of that sowing is so evident every day. Many contend that sometime in the life of a man, comes a time when he must "sow his wild oats," as they express it, and that after he has run the limit of dissipation he will settle down more readily to domestic life and become a model husband and father. There is room for argument there and I shall be glad of the views of the sisters on the subject.—Ed.

INDEPENDENCE, R. R. 2, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I haven't written a letter to COMFORT for several years and this beautiful morning, alone, but happy, in my little home I feel as though I would like to have a little chat with the COMFORT sisters. I have made so many dear friends by writing to the sisters, friends that I've never seen but love as well as those I have. I used to think one could not make friends that way but now I know they can. I haven't much of this world's goods to give but Jesus has filled my heart full of love and sympathy for every one and I can give that freely and love to do it, so sisters don't think you can give nothing to help anyone. Love is the greatest thing in the world so let's give love and sympathy for, oh, how much the world needs it and the pity of it is so few give it. Sisters, you that are going down the other side of life like myself, let's give of our experience and let's give our love and sympathy and then we will not feel lonely or forsaken. If we have Jesus for our own friend and try to make others better and happier our life will not have been in vain.

If any of the sisters care to write to me I will be glad to hear from them and will answer all letters received. Perhaps I can help them.

My own life has been full of sorrow and heartache, but I've overcome all this and am happy in my little home. God bless you all, Lovingly.

MRS. H. C. CRAWFORD.

Comfort's Sisters' Recipes and Every-day Helps

A GOOD SOUP.—Boil a good piece of boiling beef till nearly tender, then slice a few potatoes; boil about a cup of rice till thoroughly cooked, put in the soup when nearly done. Also half quart of tomatoes. Slice about three large onions for seasoning and you will have one of the finest soups you ever tasted.

MRS. LAURA WROE, Valley Springs, S. Dak.

CHICKEN CREAM SOUP.—Boil an old fowl, with an onion, in four quarts of cold water, until but two quarts remain. Take it out and let cool. To the breast, chopped fine, add the pounded yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, and strain into the soup pot. Season, add chicken and egg and a small cup of boiling milk just before serving.

PLAIN STUFFING.—Take stale bread, cut off the crust, rub very fine and pour over it as much melted butter as will make it crumble in your hands; salt and pepper to taste.

POTATO STUFFING.—Take two thirds bread and one third boiled potatoes grated, butter size of an egg, pepper, salt, one egg and enough ground sage to flavor. Add a finely chopped onion if preferred.

OYSTER STUFFING.—Three cups stale bread crumbs one half cup melted butter, salt and pepper to taste, a little finely chopped onion and one pint of oysters.

STUFFED ONIONS.—Remove skins from onions and parboil from ten to fifteen minutes in boiling salted water, cool and remove part of centers. Fill cavities with equal parts of finely chopped cooked chicken, stale bread crumbs and onion which was removed, season to taste and moisten with cream or melted butter. Place in baking pan, cover lightly with bread crumbs and bake slowly till onions are soft.

CREAMED PARSNIPS.—Boil, scrape and slice lengthwise. Put over the fire with two tablespoons of butter, to which has been added pepper, salt and a little minced parsley. Dish the parsnips, add to the boiling sauce three tablespoons of cream in which has been stirred a quarter spoon of flour. Boil and pour over the parsnips.

CROQUETTES.—One cup of boiled rice, one cup of finely chopped cooked meat, salt, pepper, two tablespoons of butter, half a cup of milk and one egg. Add rice and milk to warm milk. When this boils, add the egg well-beaten; stir one minute. When cool, shape, dip in egg and crumbs and fry.

CRANBERRY SAUCE.—One quart of cranberries, one quart of water and one pound of sugar; make a syrup of water and sugar. Drop the carefully selected berries into the boiling syrup and cook twenty minutes.—Ed.

CHILI SAUCE.—Six large tomatoes, five onions, red pepper, two tablespoons salt, two tablespoons allspice and cinnamon, one half teacup brown sugar and four cups vinegar. Boil one hour.

MRS. DELDEE KERNS, Fairfax, Va.

TO CAN PIE PLANT.—Cut in small pieces, pack in can, cover with cold water and seal without cooking.

TO CAN TOMATOES.—Pare small tomatoes and place in jars. Put half a teaspoon salt in bottom and same amount on top of jar, fill two thirds full of water and set jars in a boiler of water and boil till the water in the jar scums over.

MRS. ZELLA (RUSSELL) CASSITLY, Red Boiling Springs, Tenn.

WHITE COOKIES.—Two cups sugar, half cup butter, two eggs, one cup sweet milk, three teaspoons baking powder. Add enough flour to roll.

ROAST TURKEY.—As turkey usually forms the most important part of the dinner, too much care cannot be observed in the preparing for and cooking of our national fowl. Here are a few hints that may be followed to advantage. If the bird is very young there will be many pin-feathers. These can be removed by holding the bird over a flame, changing positions until all parts have been singed. After removing the head and feet, split the skin down the back of the neck and cut the neck out even with the shoulders, leaving the skin loose. Remove the crop, windpipe, etc., from the neck. Make an incision under the left leg. Work the fingers through the membrane and up around between the breast and the intestines and around next to the back, thus loosening everything. Remove the gizzard bringing with it all the entrails. When all the parts have been removed, put the fowl into a pan of water to which has been added one teaspoon soda for every two parts of water. Wash thoroughly inside and out, rubbing well. Rinse and dry. Season inside with salt and pepper, stuffing the breast till it is smooth and plump. Fold the skin of the neck down on the back and pin with a small skewer. Then stuff the body of the fowl, press the legs close to the body and tie by means of cord either through or around the body. The wings may be tied the same way or fastened to the body with a skewer. Season all well and rub with melted butter. Treated thus, the turkey is brought to the table in good condition and does not present the unattractive appearance it would, had it not been properly tied.

ROAST TURKEY.

LEMON SNAPS.—One cup sugar, half cup butter, two eggs, one teaspoon lemon extract, half teaspoon soda dissolved in one tablespoon sour milk; flour to make stiff and roll very thin.

MRS. DELDEE KEENS, Fairfax, Va.

CREAM CARAMEL CAKE.—Two cups sifted flour, one rounding teaspoon baking powder, one cup sugar, one half cup shortening, butter or lard, one half cup water, whites of four eggs. Sift flour then measure; add powder and sift three times. Cream sugar and butter, add flavor, then flour and milk alternately, lastly add the stiffly beaten whites. Bake in two layers twenty-five to thirty minutes.

MRS. FLOYD WINKFIELD, Nucla, Colo.

COCOA CAKE.—One cup of sugar, four tablespoons of melted butter creamed, add one cup of sour milk, one teaspoon of baking soda dissolved in a little warm water, one and one half cups of flour, one half cup of dry cocoa. Stir in a dash of salt. Flavor with vanilla. For icing use marshmallow paste made as follows: One quarter pound of marshmallows, two tablespoons of vanilla, three quarters cup of sugar, one quarter cup of milk. Boil sugar and milk together six minutes; melt the mashmallows by adding a little water, combine the two mixtures, add the vanilla and beat until stiff enough to spread. Try this and see how you like it. It has been a favorite eggless cake in our family over thirty years. We are never without it.

MRS. HARRY BENJAMIN, Monroe, New York.

CENTERPIECE OF FRUIT.—Cut off the top of a pumpkin, scoop out the soft part and seeds and use as a fruit dish. Dark and light colored grapes, bananas, bright apples, and pears together with the rich yellow of the pumpkin make an effective table decoration.

LEMON TARTS.—Mix together the juice and grated rind of two lemons, two cups of sugar, two eggs and crumbs of cake, beat all together until smooth; put into patty pans lined with piecrust, and bake until crust is done.—Ed.

SOFT GINGERBREAD.—Six cups of flour, three of molasses, one of cream, one of lard or butter, two eggs, one teaspoon of saleratus, and two of ginger. This is excellent.

SPICE CAKE.—One and one half cups of sugar, half cup of butter, half cup of sour milk, two cups of raisins chopped, three eggs, half of a nutmeg, one teaspoon cinnamon, one of cloves, one saleratus; mix rather stiff; bake in loaf tins in moderate oven.

CAKE WITHOUT EGGS.—One and one half cups sugar, half cup of butter, one cup of milk, three cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one cup chopped raisins, spices to taste.

CHOCOLATE PUDDING.—Cream three tablespoons butter, add two thirds cup sugar, one egg, well-beaten. To two and one quarter cups flour, add four and one half teaspoons baking powder and a little salt, and mix alternately with one cup of milk to first mixture. Last of all, add three squares of chocolate, melted. Turn into a butter mould and steam two hours. Serve with cream sauce made as follows: Cream one quarter cup of butter, add one cup powdered sugar, vanilla and one quarter cup of cream, beaten until stiff.

PINEAPPLE PUDDING.—Line a pudding dish with slices of cake; slice thin a pineapple and place a layer on the cake in bottom of the dish, sprinkle with sugar, then more pineapple, and so on till the dish is full; cover with slices of cake and over the whole pour a cup of water; cover and bake slowly for two hours.

FIG PUDDING.—One half pound figs, one quarter pound grated bread, two ounces powdered sugar, three ounces butter, two eggs and one teacup milk. Chop the figs and mix first with butter, then the other ingredients; butter a mould, sprinkle with bread crumbs, cover tight and boil three hours.

CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING.—One pound butter, one pound suet, freed from strings and chopped fine, one pound sugar, two and a half pounds flour, two pounds raisins, seeded, chopped and dredged with flour, two pounds currents, picked over carefully after they are washed, one quarter pound citron, shred fine, twelve eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately, one pint milk, one cup brandy, one half ounce cloves, one half ounce mace, two grated nutmegs. Cream the butter and sugar, beat in the yolks when you have whipped them smooth and light; next put in the milk, then the flour, alternately with the beaten whites, then the brandy and spice, lastly the fruit, well-dredged with flour. Mix all thoroughly; wring out your pudding-cloth in hot water, flour well inside, pour in the mixture and boil five hours.

LEMON SAUCE.—One cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, one egg, juice and grated rind of one lemon, three tablespoons of boiling water; cook in double boiler till thick.

PUMPKIN PIE.—One and one half cups steamed and strained pumpkin, two thirds cup brown sugar, one teaspoon cinnamon, one half teaspoon ginger, one half teaspoon salt, two eggs, one and one half cups milk, one half cup cream. Bake in one crust.

SCOTCH BUTTER PIE.—One and one half cups brown sugar, three eggs, two cups milk, three tablespoons flour, one tablespoon butter; mix sugar, yolks of eggs, butter, flour and milk together, put on stove and stir until it boils up thick. Beat whites well. Mix one tablespoon sugar to each egg, have two crusts baked, pour custard into crust; when brown pour on the meringue; when it is slightly brown let cool and serve.

MRS. LIZZIE BLY, Penrose, N. C.

BLACKBERRY WINE.—Put one peck of ripe berries in an earthern jar and pour over them one gallon boiling water. Let stand twenty-four hours. Extract the juice and to every gallon add three pounds of sugar. Tie thin cloth over top of it, let stand six weeks. Bottle and seal and keep in a cool place.

R. A. CLARK, Stephensville, Texas.

MOLASSES CANDY.—One cup of molasses, two cups of sugar, one tablespoon vinegar, a little butter and any desired flavoring; boil ten minutes, then cool it enough to pull.

CHOCOLATE CARAMELS.—Two cups of brown sugar, one cup molasses, one cup chocolate, grated fine, one cup boiled milk, one teaspoon flour, small piece of butter; let it boil slowly and pour on flat tins to cool, mark off while warm.—Ed.

MONT ALTO, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you allow a sister from the dear old Keystone state to enter your corner just for a few minutes' chat? Our village which lies just at the foot of the South Mountain along the beautiful Cumberland Valley Railroad, with a population of about eight hundred was recently incorporated. We have three churches, German Reform, Methodist Episcopal and the United Brethren. The last of which our family belong to. Also have a large, four-roomed school building. The mountains here have an elevation of about one thousand feet above sea level and at the top of this mountain our state has provided a tuberculosis sanitarium and infirmary building and have at present about one thousand patients who are taking treatment for tuberculosis.

The forestry department of our state also have a large Botany college, also a nine-acre nursery where they raise their own seedlings to be transplanted through the forests. White pine, black walnut, oak, catalpa, linden, etc., grow here. This work is under the supervision of one of the boys who graduated at this school.

I wish Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters, also our paper COMFORT God's blessing. MRS. HARRY S. REED.

LAKEVIEW, MICH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if among all our numbers all over this Union, there are not some who are situated as we were a short time ago; feeling dissatisfied with their surroundings and wanting to find a more agreeable home. About a year and a half ago we disposed of a fine forty acres and a beautiful home in Blue Earth County, Minnesota, to locate in Virginia, where we sought a more moderate climate. We lived there a year but our dissatisfaction grew the longer we stayed, and we were preparing to return to Minnesota when we became interested in Michigan and came here to look around. Huge barns, nice horses, beautiful, well-kept houses looked like prosperity to us and so far as we were acquainted the people were very friendly and neighborly. Lakeview, also was a very pretty town and offered a ready market for everything so we decided we would not miss it by buying. That was in April before the crops were in or the trees in leaf but every day we see new evidences of prosperity among the farmers and feel more satisfied with our one hundred and twenty-acre farm, partly within the corporate limits of Lakeview.

This year and also last have proved exceedingly dry in most parts of the Union and many farmers are becoming discouraged and are thinking of moving to a more desirable locality where crops are immune from danger of drought. To such people I want to tell about Michigan.

If you will get out your old geographies and look at the map of the United States you will readily see why drouth never interferes with crops here in Michigan. To be sure, some years are dryer than others or perhaps I should say some years have more rainfall than others, but such a thing as a damaging drouth seems to be unknown. Beside the two great lakes on either side of the state there are many inland lakes and these, of course aid in moistening the air. These same great lakes also play a large part in deciding the climate of Michigan, keeping the temperature down in summer and up in winter. Just think of weather in July and August being too cool to allow bathing in the lake, yet that has been our experience this summer. How many of you could say the same? In winter of course, the ground freezes, skating becomes a popular sport and much snow falls, but the severity of the weather is greatly tempered by the breezes from the lakes.

In crop variety Michigan cannot be excelled. How many of you know that Michigan is the only self-supporting state in the Union? Who has not heard of Michigan peaches from Michigan's famous fruit belt along the shore of Lake Michigan. All fruits and berries except the tropical varieties are successfully raised. I cannot think of any crop raised in the central, western and northern states that cannot be produced successfully here although some crops are preferred to others because of the greater profit. Montcalm county where we are is famous for its potatoes, just CHAPTER XXV.

THE RETURN.

ONE evening Sutcombe came home—he had been down to the Momus just in time to dress for dinner; and Vivienne, hearing his footsteps, called him into the dining room to look at the floral decorations.

"Aren't they pretty, Sutcombe?" she said, in the softened tones, which come so naturally to most women when they are speaking of flowers.

"Very," he assented. "Is it a special occasion?"

"Why, yes. The Letchfords are dining with us tonight. Had you forgotten?"

"Ah, yes!" he said apologetically. "I've been busy and —— Any news, Vivienne?"

It was the question he always asked when returning home, however short his absence.

Vivienne shook her head, and, as he sighed, she asked:

"Why are you so anxious, dear? Nothing can have happened to them."

He looked doubtful and troubled. "I don't know. Sometimes I'm afraid ——. It was an open boat; and I should have thought one of them would have written."

Vivienne smiled reassuringly.

"I'd trust them in a cockelshell, Sutcombe!" she said. "There was something about Lord Lesborough, in his very voice, that inspired confidence. Oh, they are quite safe and sound—somewhere. Remember, dear, they are on their honeymoon. And whoever writes on their honeymoon? For them the world contains only two persons—Vane and Decima—I mean Nina. We shall hear presently, or they will walk in one evening. I am quite sure that they are well and—happy! Go and dress, dear; you have not too much time. Is everything going right at the theater?"

He nodded. "Yes, the play is going better than ever. It will run for a twelvemonth. I'm glad the Letchfords are coming; the sight of their happiness makes one happy."

"And how much happier if one had helped them to their bliss!" she murmured. He understood her allusion to the other couple, and smiled at her appreciatingly.

"That's so," he responded simply, as he left the room.

The Letchfords came up to time. They sat down to dinner. Strangely enough—and yet not so strangely, for the Letchfords often thought of their dead friend—the conversation strayed indirectly toward the subject of Vane's death and Julian's succession.

"I met Sir Chandos Orme today—you know him, I think, Sutcombe?" said Letchford.

Sutcombe nodded. "A little; who doesn't?"

"You'll be sorry to hear that he is breaking up—at last! I saw him in St. James Street, and scarcely knew him; and he did not know me at all. He was tottering along like an old man, his wig all askew, the enamel, or whatever it is, cracked and in blotches on his face, and his lips twisted into a fatuous, senile grin. A most dreadful wreck, poor old chap! What you call an awful warning and example. I crossed over and got hold of his hand—it shook with palsy—and contrived, after some minutes, to make him recognize me. I wanted to inquire after his daughter, Judith."

"And how is she?" asked Lady Letchford, gravely.

Her husband shook his head.

"Very bad, I gathered. She has never got over the shock of"—his voice dropped—"of that terrible tragedy at Lesborough. I don't think you knew much of my poor friend, Vane Mannering, Sutcombe?"

Sutcombe colored and fidgeted. He had not been authorized to proclaim that Vane still lived.

"I—I have met him," he said.

"An awfully good fellow—one of the very best," said Letchford, with a deep sigh. "He had a very short innings; and they weren't particularly happy ones. There was some cloud. There's a kind of ban on the Lesborough family, and I'd hoped he'd broken it; but he didn't; and the present man doesn't look as if he would."

Sutcombe looked up quickly.

"You don't like him?" he said.

"Well, n—o," he replied reluctantly. "I never did, nor did Blanche. Awfully good looking chap, and sang like a—like a blessed nightingale; but —— What was it Lady Fanworthy said to you, Blanche: That he reminded her of a black panther?"

"Mr. Julian Shore—Lord Lesborough—is very dark," said Lady Letchford, with a reproachful frown at her too candid husband.

"There was never any doubt of your Lord Lesborough's death, I suppose?" asked Sutcombe; and it was now Vivienne's turn to frown at him.

"Eh? What?" said Letchford, much startled. "Why, no; how could there be? We saw—or as good as saw—him die." There was a moment's pause, then he added: "By the way, now you ask the question, there is one person who refused to believe that he was burned—old Lady Fanworthy. But, then, as everybody knows, she is the most eccentric woman in the kingdom."

"Charlie!" murmured Lady Letchford rebukingly.

"Well, so she is, Blanche."

"I'm not sure that her incredulity in this case proves her eccentricity," said Sutcombe. He had been thinking during the conversation, and was rather inclined to prepare these good friends of Vane's for the shock that sooner or later awaited them.

"Eh? What?" repeated Letchford amazedly. "I was there, you know, when the terrible affair happened——"

"And saw Lord Lesborough's body?" put in Sutcombe.

"No; no one could see that," replied Letchford, in a low voice. "But there was enough to identify him. There was the coat, a fragment of it, and the buttons——"

"He might have left the coat there," suggested Sutcombe. "Oh"—he paused impressively—"or he might have lent it to some one."

Letchford stared; then he shook his head and sighed.

"No good, Sutcombe! I wish it were! If my poor friend wasn't burned to death that night, what became of him; where is he?"

Sutcombe leaned forward, and, with all eyes, Vivienne's fearfully, fixed on him, he retorted:

"I'm lawyer enough to remind you that you have to prove that he is dead. See, now, Letchford: You say that there was a cloud over his life; that he had once before disappeared and been lost to his friends; that, although he had succeeded to the title and was well off—a rich man—he was still unhappy. How do you know that he didn't disappear again; that, for reasons you and I cannot guess, he did not yield to a desire to surrender the title and the money to his cousin, the heir, to whom he was, I believe, much attached——"

Letchford sprang to his feet, his face aglow.

"By Heaven, Sutcombe, you—you know, you have heard something!" he exclaimed.

Sutcombe crimsoned, then turned pale.

"I—I——" he stammered; but before he could say any more the servant came to the door.

"Would you step into the library, my lord?" he said very gravely.

Sutcombe, glad to escape, rose promptly.

"Excuse me a moment, will you?" he said. "Some business connected with the theater. I suppose."

He went out covertly wiping the perspiration from his forehead. He had gone further than he intended, and the interruption came at a lucky moment, and would give him time to think over some way of explaining away the impression he had created. He entered the library, then started back with a low cry; for Vane and Nina stood there.

He closed the door sharply, then got hold of a hand of each and all of them were talking at once, the two men laughing in the nervous way in which men try to conceal their emotion, and Nina standing silent, but with the happy tears in her eyes.

"When did you come back?" Sutcombe was at last able to inquire.

"Today—this moment. We sent the luggage to the Carlton and came on here. All the dinner eaten?"

"No, no!" said Sutcombe, still wringing his hand. "Just at it. And Vivienne! Can't you guess how delighted she will be. De—Lady Lesborough! And we were just talking of you! But when aren't we! But, oh, by Jove!" He stopped aghast. "There's—there are some people here you know—the Letchfords!"

Vane's face lit up, and he nodded and turned to Nina. "She knows them, though she hasn't seen them. Don't you, Nina?"

"Yes," she murmured; for how often had she not listened to his story of the Letchfords' goodness to him?

"Come on," said Vane. "We're not in evening dress, but——"

"But they think you're dead," said Sutcombe ruefully. Then his face cleared. "No, by Jove! for, as luck would have it, I've just been preparing them for the fact that you are still alive——"

"And kicking!" Vane finished. "Lead on, Macduff! Poor, dear old Letchford, how glad he'll be!"

"Give me a moment—just two moments. You stay outside the door till I give the word; you'll know when to show up!"

When he returned to the dining-room Vivienne saw from his face that he had "heard news," and she uttered a low cry. But he addressed himself to Letchford.

"You asked me just now, Letchford, to tell you where Lesborough is, if he was not killed that night, as you concluded. I couldn't tell you a few minutes ago, but I've heard news, and I can now."

Vivienne rose, supporting herself by the table.

"Sutcombe! You have seen them! Oh, where are they?"

"Here, Lady Vivienne!" came Vane's voice in response, as he and Nina entered; Nina with a cry, that was followed by one of amazement from the Letchfords, and delight from Vivienne, into whose arms Nina had glided.

For hours these good people talked, one against the other, in a state of excitement which threatened to exhaust the ladies, who, after a time, retired to the drawing-room and left the three men to more serious conversation.

"The question is," said Sutcombe gravely, "did Julian Shore know the truth?"

"I say 'no!'" responded Vane stoutly.

"'And I—— Dash it all, I wish I could!" said Letchford. "But don't be guided by me. I'm prejudiced. I never liked him."

"There is only one course to follow," said Sutcombe. "You must go down and confront him, Lesborough. You will see in a moment whether he is as guilty as I deem him. Take him by surprise, and you will find——"

"That you have wronged him!" broke in Vane. "I'll go down tomorrow. If I find that he is innocent, then I will share half the estate with him, with my wife's full and free consent. I can't give him the title; that" he paused—"is not mine to give. But anything else—— You will find I am right, Sutcombe."

But Sutcombe shook his head.

"And you are happy, dear?" Vivienne was saying to Nina, in the drawing-room, as they sat close together, hand in hand. "But what a foolish question! One has only to look at your face!"

Nina's eyes shone with her felicity.

"And I owe it all to you—and Lord Sutcombe!" she said. "There is scarcely an hour of the day that we do not talk of you; there is scarcely a moment that I do not think of you! And, oh! I am so glad to get back, though we have had such a lovely time. And my play?"

"'Going strong!' That's Sutcombe's slang, dear! We will all go and see it the very first possible night!"

Be Thankful That You're Living in The U. S. A.

By Charles Noel Douglas (Uncle Charlie)

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

When you take a look around you at the nations of the world,
Grappling with each other, with their battle-flags unfurled,
Engaged in wanton slaughter, tramping round in seas of gore,
Puncturing each other's hides amid the cannons' roar,
From their aeroplanes and airships suspended in the sky,
Dropping bombs on people's bald spots as they deep in slumber lie.
As you contemplate starved Europe munching bricks and chewing hay.
Just be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

No need for mighty armies in this glorious land of ours,
For here we have material to stand off all the powers.
If an enemy approached us, ere they could fire a gun,
We'd sic Teddy Roosevelt on them and then you'd see some fun.
And if Teddy couldn't fix them ere you could draw a breath,
William Jennings Bryan would talk the bunch to death,
And you could hear him lecture 'bout it at a Chautauqua matinay,
So be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

It's sad the awful hunger that those foreign folks endure,
While we have every luxury that money can secure.
We've pickles, the varieties mount up to ninety-seven,
Any single one of which would send you straight to heaven.
We've beef embalmed with drugs and dope, and sausages that bark;
We've hen fruit labeled strictly fresh direct from Noah's ark.
If shy a meal a loaf you steal, there's free board in prison—say!
Just be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

We're the most industrious nation beneath the heaven's dome,—
We've children in the factories, while the men all loaf at home;
Ma mustn't leave the house to vote or the home will ruined be,
But she can work in sweat shops till she's too blind to see;
There's brother on the sidewalk, sister toiling day and night,
And if the boss at forty kicks because your hair's turned white,
A wig go buy, your whiskers dye, and when you draw your pay,
Just be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

We've got a royal family,—the like has ne'er been known,—
King John the First still sits upon his oily U. S. throne.
You'll find in other countries, of kings they have but one,
While we've Kings Steel, Coal, Oil and Beef and monarchs by the ton.
They tax us in the cradle from the time we draw our breath;
Soon we'll have to pay for air or all get choked to death.
But for every million that they pinch, a dime they give away,
So be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

Our government invisible's a mighty power of gold,
Makes Republicans and Democrats all do just what they're told.
We're bossed by politicians and every kind of crook,
And though our girls can tango not one of them can cook.
Our liberties have vanished, free speech, free press are dead,
But though the goddess Liberty long from our land has fled,
We've got a statue of her standing down in New York Bay,
So be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

A libr'y built by Carnegie on every block you'll find,
So though the stomach's empty we still can feed the mind.
We've millions at the movies, theaters all are full,
While churches they are empty and have lost the power to pull.
More millions crowd the ball games, "fans" and crazy sports;
What's left are in the dippy house, the prisons or the courts.
But with war and Mrs. Pankhurst three thousand miles away,
We can still thank heaven we're living in the U. S. A.

We've got the dandiest country that lies beneath the sun;
The only trouble with it is the wicked way its run.
The masses only are to blame that things are on the blink,
For this land would be a paradise if the boobs would only think.
"Hard times and panics don't exist," the President declares,
"They're just a state of mind," so if starvation at you stares,
Mind you're only broke and hungry in a psychologic way,
So be thankful that you're living in the U. S. A.

"And Polly?" inquired Nina eagerly.

"Polly is in the sixth heaven of bliss—and will be in the seventh itself when she knows that you have come back. We will bring her home to supper with us after the theater; and —— Oh, tell us all over again what you have been doing!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

JULIAN'S CONFESSION.

The following day Julian Shore was sitting in the library. Though the weather was warm, a fire had been lit, and he had pulled the armchair close to it, and was crouching over it, with his thin, white hands held to the blaze. If there were, indeed, a ban on the house of Lesborough, that ban was resting very heavily on the present bearer of the title; for Julian Shore looked the most wretched and unhappy of men. It was not remorse that brooded like a vulture upon his mind, but the sense that the prize for which he had sold his soul would probably evade his grasp. For, though Judith had not actually cast him off and disowned him, he was convinced that, in refusing to see him, she was only temporizing and preparing him for her final declaration—that she intended to break her part of the unholy pact. She had hated him from the first, he knew, and had only been impelled to make that pact by the stings of jealousy and the promptings of ambition. In a word, she had hounded him on to the crime, from which she now shrank, and for which she refused him the reward.

It was of Judith, and almost only of Judith, he thought, as he bent forward, his dark eyes fixed gloomily on the fire. Of Vane he thought not at all. Vane had been in the way both of his passion and his greed for rank, and wealth, and power, and—Vane was removed. Judith, only Judith, sat enthroned in the mind behind the somber brow.

Even Lady Fanworthy's inquiry, almost anxious inquiry, for Deborah did not trouble him. Deborah had disappeared on the day of the fire; but her disappearance had not moved him. It was probable, he thought, that the reason for her absence which he had given was not far from the truth; she had, in all likelihood, gone to a relative. The loss of her services was felt by him occasionally; he missed her now and again; but he was as indifferent to her fate as he had been to that of the cat he had suffocated, as he had been to the dear, of Vane.

Judith! How to force her to keep her pact. He was now the Earl of Lesborough; or, at least, would soon be the acknowledged master where once he had been the dependent. He had performed his part of the contract; how should he force her to fulfill hers? His mind was at work on the question all day and every day, and his thin, bloodless lips now formed her name inaudibly. He rose presently, his lips twitching, and, taking a spirit stand from the sideboard, he poured out some brandy, and drank it slowly, meditatingly. Then he went back to the chair, and fell into his old attitude, and fell to muttering, holding an imaginary conversation between the woman on whom his black soul was set and himself. After a while he looked round vaguely, then he rose, and, with a stealthy glance round him, paid another visit to the sideboard. He had drained the glass of, this time, neat spirit, and was now the Earl of Lesborough; or, at least, heard a step in the hall outside.

He paused, and looked toward the door, and muttered in quite a matter-of fact voice:

"That was like Vane's. Strange!"

He sank into the chair, and leaned back, with closed eyes, the white lids gleaming, in a ghastly fashion, from the dark shadows which encircled his eyes; but suddenly the lids flickered. The door had opened, and a step—so strangely like Vane's—was heard in the room. He raised his lids, heavy with insomnia, and, without moving his head, turned his eyes.

Vane stood looking down at him with an anxious, doubtful, troubled inquiry.

"Julian!" he said gravely, gently. "Don't be frightened. It is I!"

Julian regarded him with lack-luster eyes.

"Too much brandy; no sleep," he muttered to himself. "I expected this. How like! It might be Vane himself."

"Don't you know me, Julian?" said Vane, still more anxiously, with a look of greater doubt and trouble in his face. "I have just returned to England. I came to tell you that I am alive. Get up, old fellow! Give me your hand, your congratulations! What is the matter? Julian, are you ill?"

"His voice, exactly!" muttered Julian, almost with admiration. "A perfect illusion, optical and aural. This is interesting; very!"

He rose, quite steadily, and went for some more brandy; and Vane approached, and would have laid his hand upon Julian's arm, but Julian drew back, not with fear, but with a laugh, and shook his head.

"No, no! You can't make your touch felt, you know. Ghosts can't materialize to that extent! No, no! So you are going to haunt me? I think not! I can lay you, my good cousin, as I raised you, with this!" He lifted the glass and drank a long draught. "It is only a question of quantity."

As Vane stood, regarding him with sad sternness, a foreboding of what was to follow, Julian went on:

"Not gone yet? What do you want? The orthodox, the regular thing—a confession? Take it, then, and be off, good ghost. And you are good, excellent! The very image of my dear, noble cousin. Won't that well-merited compliment send you back to hell—oh, no, good men like you go to heaven. I forgot! Pardon! Not gone? You will have that confession?"

His lips writhed into a mocking smile. "You insist? With all my heart. Well, then, my dear Vance, I laid the little plot which transported you to the good man's eternal reward. And you must admit that it was as neat and finished as any that even a Borgia could conceive. Come, now! confess that you had not the least glimmering of an idea that the laboratory was prepared for you; that the ropes of the ventilator had been neatly frayed, almost to parting point; that the combination of aconite and ammonia had been calculated to a nicety; that I had tried the fumes on a cat—poor, innocent cat; that I had the key of the door in my pocket, and kept it there while I lingered about the hall, until—well, until the fumes had done their work!"

Vane shrank back from the now glittering eyes, glittering with exultation over the fiendish work, the fluent words that left, gloatingly, the livid, working lips, shrank back with manly shame, as if he were the guilty one, and not the intended victim.

"Good God!" he gasped. "Are—are you mad, Julian?"

"Mad? Not a whit, thanks, ghost of my dear Vane!" retorted Julian, with a laugh, as he turned to the decanter of brandy. "I am the sanest of the sane; for I am one of those men who know what they want—and get it! I wanted your title, the Lesborough estates. I nearly had them, for you were supposed to be dead; but you were fool enough to come back to the land of the living, and robbed me. I could have killed you at that old idiot's—Tressider's—and, later that day, at my own rooms. But you didn't see it. Not you! You are one of those blind fools who are called honest, honorable men!"

The sweat stood thickly on Vane's forehead; the horror of the scene was almost intolerable. He tried to end it.

"Julian!" broke from him. "This is madness—stark, raving madness. You—you could not have done it!"

Julian took the glass from his lips to laugh derisively.

"Couldn't I? Not for the title and the estates, perhaps. I wanted them badly enough, but I—don't—think. I'm not sure, that I'd have murdered you for them. Murder's a serious thing, after all. But I wanted something more badly than I wanted the title and the estates. Can't you guess? You dull ghost, you obtuse phantom! I wanted the woman you once loved, and who still loved you—Judith!"

"Judith!" echoed Vane, in a horrified whisper.

Julian laughed.

"You echo her name pat enough. Clever ghost! Yes, I loved her. The day you took me to her—you remember?—well, it dated from that. Love at first sight. And you stood between her and me. 'When you are master where you are now dependent.' Those were her words. 'To win her I must be the Earl of Lesborough; for, you see, my dear Judith—oh, my love for her does not blind me to her faults!—is ambitious. She wants to be a countess—and, more than this, she wants to spite you, dear Cousin Vane! 'The woman scorned,' you know. You once loved her; she left you, and—you forgave her and forgot her. No woman will forgive that! So she made her pact with me. I was to get rid of you, and then——"

His voice broke and paused a moment, then went on:

"Judith! Why is she not here? I want her! She will not deceive me, will not rob me of my prize, herself, her love! No, no! The com-

Childhood Adventures on a Texas Ranch

By Adele Steiner Burleson

Copyright, 1913, by Adele Steiner Burleson.
Serial right by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTER.

Though Congressman Deering of Texas, would be detained in Washington some weeks longer by his official duties, it is decided that his wife and family, consisting of three little girls, shall leave at once for a summer outing on their Texas ranch in order to avoid the depressing influence of the city which, with the advent of hot weather, is sapping the children's health.

The party, consisting of Mrs. Deering, the children and their nurse, at the end of a long though pleasant journey by rail supplemented by an interesting drive with Len, the ranch manager's young son, who met them at the station, arrive in high spirits and are comfortably settled in the primitive but neat little cottage, under the pecan trees, prepared for their occupancy.

The ranch, which is several miles in extent, is in part cultivated as a cotton plantation and the rest is used as a range for Mr. Deering's great herd of Hereford cattle. The plantation is worked entirely by convict labor supplied by the state in return for a certain per cent of the crop, and besides the manager's house there is a cluster of buildings called "the camp" occupied by the convicts and guards.

All this is new and of somewhat startling interest to the children who are accustomed to city life.

According to the habit of the family, the two younger girls, with only a year's difference in their ages and being fast friends and playmates, are classed together under the generic designation of "the children." The eldest daughter, who, though only twelve years old, is several years their senior and bears herself toward them with a patronizing air of elderly dignity and wisdom that at times is somewhat galling to the little girls, is nicknamed "Toughey." This pet name had been conferred on her in babyhood by a college girl aunt in admiration of the child's coolness, grit and self-reliance manifest even at that tender age.

An exploration of the shady creek bottom under Len's guidance brought the day of their arrival to a close with no more serious adventures than the three girls being scared out of their wits by a gentle old cow which they thought was about to gore them to death, and the two younger children getting their fingers bitten by stinging lizards.

NOTE.—Our readers will be interested to know that "Toughey" is a true story in which the author narrates the actual exploits and adventures of her children and her own experiences during a summer, some dozen years ago, happily spent in rusticating on her ranch in a remote and somewhat wild part of Texas, far from their city home. This large domain, known as Steiner Valley, is an ancestral estate inherited by Mrs. Burleson, from her father, Dr. Steiner, who was an army surgeon and served with distinction through the war with Mexico which added Texas and an empire besides to the territory of the United States.

In mentioning herself and her husband (now Postmaster General) in the story she has modestly assumed the name of "Deering" which our readers are at liberty to change to Burleson. EDITOR.

CHAPTER II.

THE children were awakened late the next morning by a flood of sunshine. To lose time sleeping was no part of their plans for the summer and they had gone to bed promising each other to be up with the dawn.

The discovery that Toughey had arisen early and had unbroken clabber for breakfast, whereas theirs through long standing and the heat of the day was nearly all whey, was discouraging. It gave her a long start ahead of them; they had intended to be first in everything. It was, moreover, only a part of their grievance. Toughey had also helped with the churning and been rewarded with unstinted quantities of fresh buttermilk and the privilege of working the butter into a little round pat now hardening on the ice. Toughey had proudly displayed it as her work.

They were saved from a fit of sulks by the timely arrival of Len. His approach was first indicated by the rattle of the chain used to fasten the big gate opening into their enclosure from the road. There was a general rush to the front gallery where they all stood watching him and admiring first the skill with which he undid the fastening without dismounting, then the furious pace at which he covered the level stretch of ground between the gate and the house, and finally his sudden stop at the very edge of the gallery without injury to himself or his pony. To Toughey, he was the very spirit of the plains; she longed to imitate his reckless driving and to repeat in her own costume, so far as possible, the cowboy picturesqueness of his outfit.

"Do you think it's hard to ride?" she asked carelessly.

"Dead easy!" said Len, "anybody could ride this goat!"

And with a touch of his Mexican spurs he made the animal execute a series of bounds and high side stepping, that served rather to impress the little girls with the difficulties of riding.

"Get on," invited Len, throwing himself from the saddle with an easy movement that left Toughey in a state of grovelling admiration.

Toughey hesitated; she longed to make the trial, but shrank from the ridicule which she knew would follow a display of unskillful horsemanship; but the children, uninfluenced by such considerations, responded eagerly, though somewhat timidly, to the invitation. Len proved himself a careful teacher and carried them safely through the early stages of horseback riding. They progressed from a secure seat behind him to one less steady in the saddle; from limp figures hanging fearfully to his blouse to humped monkeys clinging desperately to the pommel, and on to unsteady but ambitious and confident little riders, keen for the pleasure to be had from a gentle pony in the country.

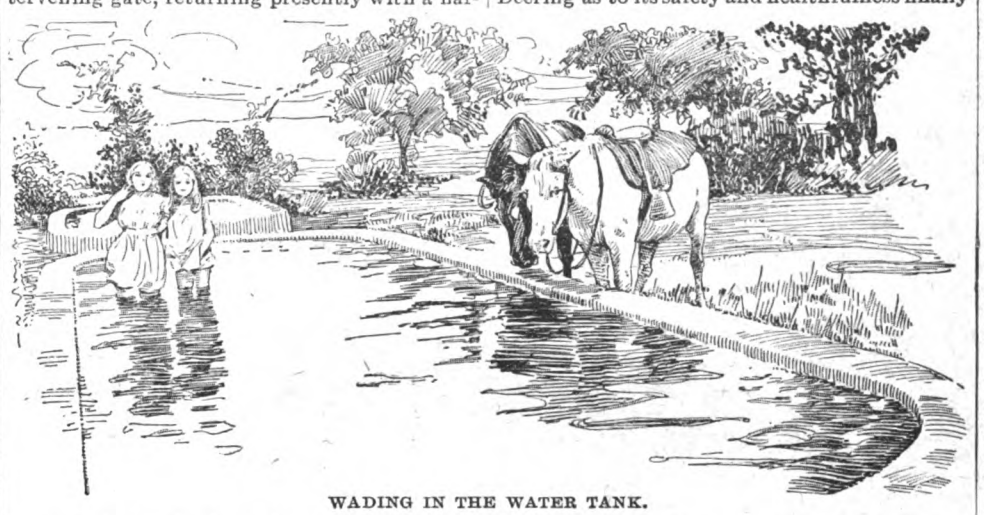
The spirit originally displayed by the pony was evidently a product of Len's spurs, for in the children's hands it became quite docile and in fact showed such a disposition to stop whenever an excuse offered that Toughey's contempt was excited and she was led into ridiculing its mettle. She enjoyed playing the part of a critic. At the same time she was attentive to Len's instructions to the children, whose mistakes she secretly resolved to avoid. When urged to take her turn at riding, she excused herself upon the ground that she was not in riding dress and that she preferred her own saddle which was not yet unpacked.

The ponies provided for the little girls' use during the summer were still in the pasture where they had been running at large for some months. Isum, the old negro in charge of the small stock of cattle attached to the farm, was to drive them in the next day, but, as the pasture was only two or three miles away, Toughey and the children agreed to Len's suggestion to go out that afternoon and look at them.

After consultation with Mrs. Deering, it was decided that Toughey should ride Len's pony, and that the others should go in the buggy, a topless little vehicle commonly used by old Isum for hauling salt to the cattle at the pasture. Four o'clock was to be the hour for starting.

Len now started for the Camp to look up, from among the large assortment of mules and horses, something suitable to drive. There were days on the Plantation when everything that could be put to a plow or wagon was in use and Len felt uneasy as a glance at the field showed him a long line of plows. He would be lucky to find anything other than a few tired mules turned into the pasture to rest or some horse that had gone lame and was unfit for service. It was just possible that a plow hand might have been laid off for the day because of sickness, in which case his mule would still be in the corral.

Len sent his pony racing along the road. To the left stretched the wide field and to the right the low hills, beyond which lay the grasslands. In a few minutes he was within sight of the sheds and pens used for the mules. These structures, with the Manager's house, the large building occupied by the prisoners, and quarters for the guards, together with a blacksmith shop, sheds covered with cedar brush, for the protection of the farm implements, corn cribs and various outhouses, constituted what was known as "The Convict Camp," or, more commonly, "The Camp."



Neither mule nor horse was to be seen, but Len did not give up the search until he had entered the corral and patiently explored every corner wherein a four-footed beast might be supposed to hide itself. Nothing answering his needs could be found. Disappointed, he slowly made his way back to the hilly pasture through which he had come from "Pecan Hollow," the home of the little girls, and to which he must now return to tell then that the afternoon excursion must be given up.

At this moment a little yellow mule, known as Dixie, walked from behind a clump of cedars and stood looking out over the field at the distant laborers with an expression so human as to be comical. Len chuckled at the sight and retreating softly slipped back through the intervening gate, returning presently with a halter and a handful of sorghum. Throwing his pony's bridle over a sumach bush and uttering a coaxing whistle, he approached Dixie on foot with the sorghum extended in one hand and the halter in the other. The little mule turned an alert attention upon him. She had feminine ways that made her capture uncertain; but she was a prize worth struggling for. A favorite with both guards and men, and sought after on all occasions, it was not uncommon to find Dixie loafing in the pasture when she should have been at work. This fact was due to her own talents, for she could flatten her body and crawl under a barb wire fence like a dog, or by resting her top legs on the fore string, vault over as easily as a boy. Whether she owed her intelligence to some trick ancestor or had acquired it through the pressing necessities of her own life was not known, for she had arrived at the Plantation some years before, one of a carload of mules from St. Louis, without pedigree or history. But at any rate, her acquirements gained for her the respect to which she was entitled, and none but the hopelessly ill-tempered ever resented it when she outwitted her keepers. Her capture, as Len well knew, could not be effected through any strategy of his, and he offered the sorghum more as an expression of his good will than as a decoy. Dixie's contempt for the substantial pleasures of the corn crib was generally recognized, and when she allowed herself to be taken it seemed to be either a graceful concession to duty, or because the freedom of the pasture had ceased to be attractive to her. Fortunately for Len's plans, she proved to be in an acquiescent mood and graciously accepting his tribute submitted to having the halter slipped over her inquisitive and bumptious little nose. Fearful of a change of heart, however, he kept Dixie tied till afternoon and then, mounting his pony, he led her to Pecan Hollow where he found the children awaiting him as anxiously as if he had been late instead of being, as in reality he was, an hour ahead of the appointed time.

Immediately entering his service, they went with him to the shed where the buggy was kept, looked up the whip, put the cushion seat straight, solemnly watching the complicated process of harnessing Dixie, and finally, under Len's close supervision, drove triumphantly through the grove to the front of the house, one holding the reins, the other the whip. After securing Dixie to a tree, Len turned his attention next to unsaddling his own pony for Toughey's use.

A beautiful little English saddle lay on the floor of the gallery, but he looked vainly around for a side-saddle, and as Mamma had gone to collect the necessary sunshades, umbrellas, gloves, etc., for the trip, he called the children to know where it could be found. But these small people were too busy licking flies from Dixie's coat with the whip, to that lady's growing surprise and indignation, to heed the question, and he was about to refer it to Toughey herself, who at that moment appeared at the door; but, as she came fully into view and walked towards him, he hesitated and stopped. She was dressed in loose black trousers, a blouse of the same color and material, and a boy's hat. In her hand she carried an English crop. When she pointed to the saddle as hers, explaining that side-saddles belonged to an unscientific past and that they were all to ride astride in obedience to her father's orders, Len's surprise and confusion were complete.

Toughey spoke hurriedly and with a very red face, but her courage carried her safely through the ordeal of doing something out of the ordinary. Len, on the contrary, could not rally so quickly. His ideas of propriety had been disturbed, and, although he helped Toughey to place the saddle on his pony and showed her how to buckle the girths and taught her to mount, he found it hard, in his own mind, to adjust himself to the new order of things. The start found him silent and still wrestling with the proposition, but a few words from Mrs. Deering as to its safety and healthfulness finally dispelled his doubts, and with the admission that even the fads and fancies of city folks are sometimes based on common sense, his spirits returned and he began to enjoy the fresh impressions of the little girls and resumed his old position of instructor and guide.

WADING IN THE WATER TANK.

Their destination was the hay pasture situated on the prairie, and owing its name to the quantities of long grass cut there every summer to be used for fodder during the winter. The way to it lay through other pastures, separately enclosed and embracing within their limits numerous small hills with intervening hollows and canyons. For a time the road skirted the field but presently turning away, led through creek bottoms, somber from the shade of big trees, along the edge of ravines thick with a tangled growth of underbrush, up steep slopes where the thin soil could support only the sumach and cedar, and finally out to the breezy prairie, a seemingly boundless stretch of undulating green, crossed by an occasional line of wire fencing, and broken here and there by small clumps of timber.

The children, who at the beginning of the drive had been tucked down in front between the seat and the dashboard, and had at first been demurely content, soon reached the squirming stage and developed so many knees and elbows that Mamma was glad to yield to their clamor to be transferred to the little extension at the back of the buggy. This arrangement gave them more room and a wider view.

In the meantime, poor Toughey was vainly striving to enjoy her ride. The gentle pony of the morning had vanished and in its place was a restless creature full of nervous starts and quivers that made her feel cold in spite of the heat. Toughey's courage and self confidence were real, but she delighted in displaying both qualities, especially before the children, whom she persisted in regarding as "poor, little 'scarecats'," which was to be overcome only through her own example. A deadly fear now seized her that the pony might throw her off and forever disgrace her in the eyes of her little sisters, who were at the same time her admirers and imitators. From the beginning she was obliged to hold to the saddle, a necessity she bitterly resented. In fact, Toughey resented the whole situation; she had expected everything to be so different. Her beautiful saddle was uncomfortable and the stirrups were too long or too short (Toughey was not sure which). The bridle kept slipping through her hand and getting looser, and then the pony would make a sudden break, requiring her to let go her hold on the saddle in order that she might have both hands free to rein him up, all the while clinging desperately to the pony with her knees to keep from falling off.

"Isn't it nice, Toughey!" called the children above the rattle of the buggy.

"Yes!" answered Toughey with a convulsive movement that made the pony take a fresh start and pass the buggy.

"She's holdin' on! she's holdin' on!" screamed the children with impish delight, noting the fact for the first time. Toughey's answer to this taunt was lost in the distance as the pony bore her rapidly away, only slacking his pace when he reached a rocky incline. Here Toughey succeeded in bringing him to an uneasy standstill, and awaiting the approach of the buggy said, with a heroic smile:

"Isn't this glorious!"

She was bruised and miserable, but in her plucky little heart she was determined that no one should know it.

"I say," said Len, his eyes on the fidgeting, pony, "Moon doesn't like that saddle of yours; it's too fine for him."

"Oh, he'll have to get used to it," remarked Toughey in a voice that trembled though it expressed little sympathy for any kind of weakness.

"He's afraid of it," continued Len. "You'd better get in here and let me ride him," and handing the reins to Mrs. Deering, Len leaped to the ground. For one moment Toughey had an overwhelming sense of the rest and comfort within reach at her mother's side, and then she repelled the thought as unworthy even of consideration.

"No, indeed!" she replied with exaggerated emphasis, starting the pony up the hill to show that arguments with her were useless. Mamma regarded her with anxious eyes but said nothing. She rarely interposed an objection to Toughey's standards or forced a surrender of her ideals to the common-sense view of a situation.

If Toughey's pride brought with it pain and at times even humiliation, it at least saved her from anything that was abject and unworthy.

"She sticks on all right," said Len watching Toughey's progress as he followed in her wake with Dixie and the buggy. "And she's got grit," he added admiringly.

It was some comfort to Toughey to know that Moon's meek soul had not been aroused by her own poor riding and guiding as in her mortification, she had supposed, but by the thousand little shrieks and squeaks given out by the new leather of the saddle, and to which she now found herself lending as strained attention as the pony.

Arriving at the brow of the hill, they found themselves facing a wide sweep of prairie. A few cattle could be seen and in the middle distance rose a windmill, the almost inevitable feature of every landscape in a stockraising and agricultural country.

To this structure Len directed their course. They had now entered the Hay Pasture, and after closing the gate leading into it, Len paused to readjust Toughey's stirrups and give her saddle a few vigorous shakes to test its firmness. This attention to Moon's trappings had a quieting effect upon him. He seemed less alive to the groans of the new leather, and began to travel at a soberer gait that brought great relief to Toughey's overstrained nerves. Except at haying time, the Pasture was rarely entered, save by old Isum, so there was no road and Toughey enjoyed the ride through the long grass which bent and rustled under the pony's feet.

Now and then the children cried out, as a snake wriggled away from their path and they

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING EVENTS.

Judge Ashburton, father of Alice Ashburton marries for his second wife Mrs. Farquahar, who has a daughter Imogen. Robert Ingraham, cousin to Alice is in love with Alice Imogen is in love with Roland Fletcher who marries Alice. Robert Ingraham marries Imogen and goes to Rome. Roland Fletcher's business takes him abroad. A girl is born to Alice Fletcher. Her health failing, Robert decides to send the baby to her grandfather, Judge Ashburton, and places her in the care of the consul who gives her to the captain and stewardess of the Gracieuse bound for New York. Imogen employs a detective, who informs her of Alice's condition and the disposal of the child. Imogen, carrying her child, born one month after Robert Ingraham's death, boards the steamer, gains access to the stateroom where Olive Fletcher is sleeping, raises the little baby and removing its cloak, upon which is sewed one half of a card, the other half having been sent to Judge Ashburton by the consul, puts it on her own child and places her in the berth, where she is cared for and given to Judge Ashburton as Olive Fletcher. Imogen puts Olive Fletcher in the extension case, in which she brings her own child and hurriedly leaves the steamer, unconscious she is watched. Judge Ashburton, shocked when he reads of Robert Ingraham's death given six months previous to date, writes to Imogen and offers her a home. She conceals the birth of her child, Alice Fletcher dies. Roland Fletcher comes home for a visit and Imogen, who has the care of Olive brings her to her father. She exhibits a bad temper. A few days later Roland removes her shoes and stockings and not finding the scar of a cross tattooed on each ankle he declares she is not his child. Going to New York he sees the consul and Captain Hadley who assure him the exchange of babies was an impossibility. Roland Fletcher adopts a boy from the slums who is given the name of William Curtis Marchmont in baptism. Seventeen years later the young are in Europe. Olive is the chum of her grandmother, who gives her a pony. They go for a ride. Imogen standing in the door, and expressing her delight of the pony is confronted by a man who requests a few minutes' conversation. She ignores having ever seen him. He refreshes her memory and asks for money, an amount equal to what her secret is worth. She denies having one. He asks, "If the young lady who drives away is Miss Olive Fletcher where is the child Helen Farquahar Ingraham christened in Rome, January 15, 18—?" She pays him one hundred pounds, promising him the same amount six months later. The pony becomes unmanageable but is quieted by Alice and Mary Weston, daughters of Mrs. Weston of whom the judge buys the pony. William Curtis Marchmont, Roland Fletcher's son rides up and is introduced to the girls, losing his heart to Alice. The pony is unhitched and Olive and her grandfather accept the Westons' hospitality. Mrs. Weston tells the story of their lives and Alice's desire to study law. Judge Ashburton is surprised at Alice's knowledge and clearness of thought and makes the way easy for her to read law with him. Will Marchmont is to return to Yale. Learning to love Alice he determines to win her for his wife. Going for a walk a shower makes a shelter necessary. A report of a pistol frightens Alice. They meet Arthur Stamford, who has been injured by the explosion of a cartridge. Introductions follow and Alice invites him to her home where her mother skillfully cleanses and bandages the injured hand. Mrs. Weston invites the gentlemen to lunch and Arthur Stamford determines to know more of the family. Preparations are made for a farewell reception to Will. Judge Ashburton asks if invitations have been sent to the Misses Weston. Imogen and Olive object. Judge Ashburton appeals to Roland Fletcher, who insists they shall be invited. The invitation is accepted. Imogen and Olive, receiving with Mr. Fletcher, ignore Alice's half-extended hand. Mr. Fletcher mortified and displeased receives Alice most cordially and welcomes her to Castleview. Later he leads her in a quadrille, after which they go into a long corridor. Stopping before a painting Alice learns it is the portrait of Mr. Fletcher's wife. He wishes nothing better for her, than she may be as happy with his boy, as he was with his wife. Will joins them and Olive passes without a word of greeting. Mr. Fletcher follows Olive and requests that she be more courteous to her guests. Will goes to Yale. Judge Ashburton opens his office in town with Alice as his clerk. May is busy. Arthur Stamford is called to the Continent by his father's illness. Olive and Imogen out driving Olive proposes they call for her grandfather. Imogen orders Buxton to drive to the office. Olive takes the lines, Judge Ashburton insists that Alice, who is suffering from a headache rides home. A newspaper caught in the wind frightens one of the horses and both spring forward. Olive drops the lines.

CHAPTER IV.

A LOST LOVE LETTER.

IMOGEN and Olive were nearly frightened to death, as the horses tore along the road at their breakneck speed, but to their credit be it said, after that one terrified shriek from the latter, both sat in dumb horror awaiting in despair what they believed must be an awful fate.

Alice's heart gave one great startled bound in her throat in view of their desperate situation, and a sense of utter helplessness for a moment overpowered her, as she saw the lines trailing along the ground, and knew that they were all at the mercy of the fear-maddened horses.

Then suddenly, all the reserve force of this wonderful girl arose within her to battle for her own life and the lives of her companions.

She thought of Will and his love for her—of the bright future which they hoped to share, and she told herself that she could not be blotted out of existence in this cruel manner. She thought of those selfish women at her side—she knew that they both hated her, and her fate would matter little to them; but they were human. Roland Fletcher's daughter and Judge Ashburton's granddaughter was doubtless the most precious object in life to them, and she resolved that she would try to save her, even though she herself should perish in the attempt.

She had been used to horses all her life, for her father, in his better days, had kept several, some of them quite mettlesome steeds, and she had once broken a colt that had been declared unmanageable. Farmer Weston had been heard to say that he would trust Alice to drive anything that anyone could drive; and, recalling these past experiences, with a backward flash of memory, she determined to do a bold thing.

"Sit perfectly still, both of you!" she commanded, authoritatively, as she saw Olive edging toward the back of the trap, as if she were contemplating leaping out; "you will surely be killed if you jump; I will try to get the reins. If I can, I believe I can save us all."

She had risen while speaking, and now climbed over upon the driver's seat, although this was accomplished with difficulty, for the carriage was rocking and swinging fearfully.

Her next move was even more dangerous, and caused the horror-stricken spectators along the street to hold their breath in an agony of suspense—she stepped over the dashboard, steadying herself with one hand, and stood upon the thill. "Whoa, boy! whoa! be quiet, now!" she called out, in a clear, reassuring voice, to the horses, and kept on talking in a soothing tone to them, while she watched her opportunity.

Even while she was speaking, she could see, by the way they threw back their ears, that they had caught her words, and recognized her friendly tones.

"Softly! softly! it is all right! good boys! whoa, now!" she continued, while she bent eagerly forward to seize the lines as they were tossed hither and thither by their mad flight.

Her chance soon came, although she risked much to avail herself of it, for the switch of the tail of the off horse sent the reins close to her outstretched hand.

She grasped them, drawing them carefully up, lest they become entangled in the flying feet; then stepping back over the dashboard, seated herself upon the driver's box.

"It's all right, boys! whoa, now! be quiet, will you?" she cried, with friendly authority, as she drew the ribbons taut in a strong but gentle grasp, but with a touch which showed a practiced hand.

The horses were well trained, and they seemed to know, intuitively, that an experienced, but friendly, hand was guiding them; it mattered not that only a white-faced, delicate girl was behind them, they recognized that the master spirit was there, and it became evident to every observer that they were gradually yielding to it.

It was well for them all that the avenue was straight, broad and well graded, for it gave them a great advantage. Other teams were thus enabled to get out of their path, and there was nothing to obstruct their way.

With the lines once in her hands, and that open road before her, Alice felt reasonably sure that she was mistress of the situation. She did not once relax her strong, steady pull, nor her authoritative, but reassuring commands to the refractory animals, and after a run of more than half a mile, they finally became convinced that there was really nothing to be frightened at, and though still nervous, and all on the alert, were gradually brought under complete control.

As soon as she had calmed them down to a walking pace, Alice guided them to a triangle where another street ran into the avenue, turned them about, and drove them quietly back toward the office, but still encouraging them, now and then, by the sound of her voice.

Halfway back she met the coachman, who, hatless and pale with fright, had been tearing frantically after them.

Alice drew up beside him.

"Get in quickly and quietly," she said, and the next moment he was on the seat beside her, the lines once more in his strong hands, while a great sigh of gratitude burst from many hearts as the spectators saw him in his place.

Then the reaction came for the heroic girl, who had braved so much, and she sank back, white to her lips, and feeling as if she could never move again, and wholly unconscious of the glances of admiration and words of commendation which were bestowed on her upon every hand as she passed.

"The coolest piece of work I ever saw done!" "A downright plucky girl!" "A little heroine!" etc., etc., were some of the encomiums that were heaped upon her, and yet she heard not one of them, for, in imagination, she had flown across the Atlantic to her lover, her grateful heart thrilling with its pæan of joy.

"Oh, Will! Will! I am safe! safe. I could not leave you yet!"

When they came up with Judge Ashburton, who, with a terrible fear in his heart, had hurried on as fast as he was able after the coachman, they stopped again to take him in.

"Are they all right now, Buxton?" he inquired, in a breathless tone, and with a dubious glance at the handsome but foam-flecked creatures.

"All right, and calm as two old cows, sir; thanks to the young leddy, she 'ave saved three broken necks, and an iligant pair of 'orses, to say nothing of the trap—God bless her!" replied the man, as he bestowed a reverent look upon his silent companion.

"Were you very much frightened, my dear?" the judge questioned, in his kindest tone, regarding her with an anxious look.

But their hopes shall never be consummated-never!

The next moment the glimmer of a candle appeared around the corner.

Her next move was even more dangerous, and caused the horror-stricken spectators along the street to hold their breath in an agony of suspense.

"I do not know—I did not stop to think about that," she returned, in a faint voice and smiling wearily.

"Poor girl, it was a terrible ordeal," said her friend, in a tone that was far from steady; adding: "Now, if you will get inside the trap you will ride more comfortably."

"Thank you, Judge Ashburton; but please do not ask me to move. I fear I could not without betraying to everybody what a veritable coward I am, now that the danger is over," Alice responded, with a nervous little laugh, which betrayed how little strength she really had left.

More than that she felt a repugnance to rejoining the ladies who had been so ungracious to her.

"All right—I reckon that you are better off where you are," returned her friend.

He then entered the vehicle, expressing himself sincerely grateful over the safety of all, and they drove away in the direction of Beechcote.

Alice did not speak once during the drive, although her companions freely discussed the recent thrilling incident.

She was struggling to regain her composure, color and strength, so that she need not alarm her mother and sister upon her arrival, for her nerves were terribly shaken by the strain which they had undergone.

When they reached the cottage, the judge, bidding the driver keep a watchful eye on the horses, alighted and helped Alice down from her lofty perch.

"My child, your hands are as cold as ice! I hope this has not knocked you out completely," he observed, as he regarded her with earnest solicitude.

"No, indeed, it will not," she cheerily responded. "On the whole, I believe it has done me good, for it has entirely frightened away that miserable headache that has been haunting me all day."

"I am glad if nothing more than the headache was frightened, and we will be thankful for that small favor," the judge observed, smiling almost fondly into her white face.

Then turning to Imogen and Olive, while a slight frown contracted his brow, he continued:

"And have you ladies nothing to say to Miss Weston for the daring act of heroism which has doubtless saved your lives?—this is the second time that we have cause to be very grateful to her."

Olive flushed crimson, and Imogen bit her lips with anger at the tone of reproof.

"Of course," Imogen admitted. "Miss Weston has been very brave; but I, myself, am still so unnerved from fright that I surely may be pardoned for not having my wits about me."

"Of course," Olive echoed, "we are very glad to be safe; but under the circumstances, grandpapa, I think you are a little hard on us," she concluded, with a pout.

That was all; neither addressed the brave girl directly, and neither bestowed so much as a look of gratitude upon her.

Alice bowed courteously as she bade them good evening, and then, after shaking hands with the judge, went slowly up the steps and into the house.

Buxton, the coachman, turned his horses around, but muttering a very irreverent oath under his breath as he did so, and drove rapidly toward Castleview.

The face of Judge Ashburton was white and stern, and after a few moments, turning to his companions, he remarked in tones of grave displeasure:

"Imogen, I am at a loss to understand your seemingly heartless indifference to the heroic act which that brave girl has performed, and, Olive, I am ashamed of and sadly disappointed in you for the same reason."

Olive answered him by bursting into passionate weeping, and the sight of her tears aroused Imogen to a white heat of anger.

She sat proudly erect, and drew her mantle more closely about her shoulders, as she remarked, with curling lips:

"Really, Judge Ashburton, I cannot understand your strange infatuation for that low-born girl. I have been told that both she and her sister were veritable little horse jockies, as children, and could ride, drive and manage horses equal to any circus performer; consequently, the act of today, which you claim to have been so 'heroic,' was merely a piece of very clever posing which has won the admiration of the public and the eclat of being regarded as a heroine."

The gentleman had listened to and regarded the speaker in undisguised amazement during this venomous speech.

When she had concluded, there was a moment of awkward silence, then he frigidly observed:

"Well, Imogen, you have unveiled to me, this evening, a phase of your character for which I was wholly unprepared."

The woman grew even paler than she had previously been, at his words.

In her anger and mortification over his reproof of her heartlessness and his severity toward Olive; in her malice and irritation because of his high praise of Alice, she had forgotten herself, given rein to her tongue and betrayed the cloven foot.

She realized her mistake all too late, for she saw that she had shocked and deeply offended the judge, and that her offense was one which he would be long in forgetting, if, indeed, he ever forgot it.

No other word was spoken during the remainder of their drive, although Olive gradually recovered her composure and dried her tears; but she could not lift her head—she could not force herself to meet the sorrowful reproach which she knew shone in her grandfather's eyes.

It had seemed to her, of late, as if a barrier had been growing up between them; ever since that day when Alice Weston had appeared upon the scene, at the time of the accident to the phaeton, and especially since the fete at Castleview, she had been strangely changed.

She sometimes wondered if she could be the same girl, for, previous to those events, she had been, for the most part, care-free and happy; but of late, her heart had been consumed with envy, hatred and jealousy—elements which, with rare exceptions, had lain dormant in her nature, and which now rendered her both miserable and unlovely.

While she sat thus, with bowed head, musing upon what had occurred during the last hour, she espied something upon the floor of the trap that sent an electric shock through every nerve in her body—arousing anew and intensifying all the worst passions of her nature.

The object which attracted her attention was a letter.

It was addressed in Will Marchmont's bold, familiar hand, to Miss Alice Weston, Windsor, England, and bore the United States of America postmark.

The girl blushed a burning, angry crimson; then the color died away, leaving her white, and as cold as a stone.

By a dexterous movement she kicked her dress out over the missive, thus concealing it from the view of her companions.

When the carriage stopped, the judge got out first, to assist the ladies.

Imogen followed him, and this allowed Olive opportunity to secure the letter, which she hastily concealed about her person; then springing, unaided, from the trap, she rushed into the house and up to her own room.

Locking the door after her, she snatched the letter from its hiding place and devoured the superscription.

Yes, it was from Will. There could not be the slightest doubt about it—she would have known his handwriting anywhere, and she loved every line and stroke of his pen.

It was a recent letter—received that very day, having been posted in New Haven, Conn., eight days earlier.

It had been opened, too; one end of the envelope having been carefully and evenly cut across.

Her face flushed a shamed and guilty red at the thought; but her eyes gleamed with a jealous fire, and her small, white teeth were set with a resolute purpose.

She slipped the closely written sheets from their envelope, and in another moment was absorbed in the love-laden message.

Who shall describe the emotions that swept over her as she read!

An artist would have found the task a hopeless one, and the pen is powerless to do so.

They were as varied as the thoughts which produced them, and when the last page was finished, she was in full possession of the sweet secret which the lovers fondly believed was, with one or two exceptions, all their own.

"Ha! so my suspicions were well founded, after all!" Olive breathed, in a passionate whisper. "I did not dream that matters had gone so far. But their hopes shall never be consummated—never! Heavens! how did I ever bear to read such words written by him to another woman?" she concluded hoarsely, and shaking the missive viciously in her rage.

Then she bowed her face upon her hands, and wept like one bereft of her dearest hope.

But anger was uppermost, and she soon burst forth again.

"To think!" she cried, "that a beggar like Alice Weston should have won him without an effort, when I would give all I possess, or expect to possess, for one fond word from him. And grandpapa is also bewitched with her. Papa, too, lost his head over her at the fete last year, and has been sounding her praises ever since. How can I bear it—what shall I do! Oh! let me think!"

CHAPTER V.

AN UNDERGROUND ADVENTURE.

Olive returned the letter to its envelope, then throwing herself into a chair fell into a train of musing, bitter beyond description.

"I am sure I don't know why I love him so," she muttered; "he really is a nobody, whom papa found in the slums of New York; he hasn't a penny except what papa gives him, and will have his own fortune to make, while there are a dozen rich and high-born young men, here in Windsor, any one of whom I could marry tomorrow if I chose."

Her eyes were clouded, and an unlovely frown disfigured her face as she proceeded.

"But there isn't one among them who can hold a candle to Will, either in looks, intelligence or manliness. I suppose people would declare I am a fool when I might marry a title, perhaps; but I cannot help it, I love him, and, though he is himself a beggar, I would become his wife this moment if he would but ask me. But as for his marrying Alice Weston, he never shall if there is any strategy that can keep them apart. What shall I do with this letter?" she went on, slapping it impatiently upon her palm; "won't she be wild when she misses it, and thinks she may have lost it on the road where it might be picked up and read by a passer-by? I don't quite like to burn it, and I'm sure I don't want to keep it, to be tortured every time it meets my eye. I've half a mind to go down to the office some day and hand it to her, and let her know that I have discovered her precious secret. I'll think about it. Oh, dear! I wish we had not gone out driving this afternoon," she sighed, in an irritable tone. "Of course the whole town will ring with the affair—the newspapers will proclaim it abroad with their nauseating sentimentality about heroism, etc. I wonder what papa will have to say about the wonderful exploit of grandpapa's remarkable prodigy?"

Mr. Fletcher's appreciation of that young lady's act was made manifest by his going, that very evening, to call upon Mrs. Weston and her daughters, to whom he expressed his great sense of obligation and deep gratitude for Alice's courage and self-abnegation in facing a peril that would have appalled the heart of many a strong man.

He spent an hour with them, being most delightfully entertained, and went away acknowledging to himself that, in spite of their humble station in life, Will was a lucky fellow to have found such a jewel as Alice Weston.

Two days later our fair heroine received by express a neat package which, upon opening, she found to contain a beautiful gold watch, richly studded with diamonds, also a handsome chain, the friendly note accompanying them, begging her to accept the same together with the gratitude and best wishes of Roland Fletcher. The same day she also received through the post an envelope containing Will's precious letter, which she believed she had lost on the street during that frightful and never-to-be-forgotten ride behind a pair of maddened horses.

Olive, after considering the matter, had thought best to return the epistle. She had her maid, who wrote a fair hand, address the envelope, then she inclosed the missive and posted it herself. The following two months slipped quickly by, and then Will Marchmont returned to Castleview for his vacation. He looked a trifle thin from close application to his studies, but otherwise well and happy.

Alice showed a rather pale face, for she had been a most ambitious and conscientious worker, and her lover at once insisted that she must have a complete rest, saying that he would take her place in Judge Ashburton's office for the few hours a day that he would be needed, for business was not very brisk just at that season.

A most delightful summer followed, for Olive, Imogen and Mr. Fletcher went to Switzerland. Will had been invited to accompany them, but he excused himself, saying that he had agreed to help the judge, and, as that gentleman was most considerate, the lovers were free to enjoy themselves in their own way a great deal of the time.

May was a trifle lonesome and pensive, during this time, for Arthur Stamford was still abroad with his father, and she could not quite stifle the pangs of her yearning heart, while witnessing the happiness of her sister with her betrothed, although both were the recipients of her heartiest sympathy.

September brought another separation, but it was cheerfully met and the year, filled with work and study, passed even more quickly than the previous one.

Another followed swiftly in its train, and bringing no events of any importance, unless we mention the fact that Imogen received several visits, during the time, from her tormentor, the detective, who, upon each occasion, demanded an increase of the amount she had been paying him.

She was angrily rebellious in view of his extortion, but was conquered in every instance and was glad to get rid of the wretch at any price, even though she was sure that he would return again, unless fate should suddenly cut him short in his career, which she most earnestly hoped it might do.

So the third June came around, and with it Will's third and last vacation, for he would complete his course at the close of another year.

He had been at home only a few days when Judge Ashburton arranged for a little excursion, which included Alice and May Weston, to a lovely spot which was a favorite resort for parties some ten or twelve miles down the river.

He had planned it during the temporary absence of Olive and Imogen, who were visiting friends in the Isle of Wight, and Mr. Fletcher was in France on important business.

They were conveyed in the very trap and by the same horses which had figured so conspicuously more than two years before, and by means of which Alice had so distinguished herself. But the spirited steeds had never given anyone the slightest trouble since, which proved that they had been completely subjugated at that time; and Buxton, who still retained his position as coachman, never wearied of rehearsing the exciting adventure and the praises of "the pluckiest little leddy that ever 'eld a pair of lines in 'er small 'ands."

He was to drive the party today, and a groom also accompanied them to take charge of the fishing tackle and a good-sized hamper, which the judge had ordered to be packed before leaving Castleview.

Their ride proved to be a most delightful one, for it was along a country road, while the day was perfect and the company very harmonious.

Upon arriving at their destination, they were both surprised and delighted to meet Arthur Stamford, who, with his father, Sir Arthur Stamford, had come upon a similar excursion for the entertainment of some young relatives who were visiting at Stamford Manor.

After the ceremony of introductions was over, the two parties agreed to combine into one and do their sightseeing, fishing, etc., together.

Mr. Tom Radcliffe, one of the Stamford guests, was a recent Eton graduate—a frank, handsome fellow, the eldest son of an eminent London barrister; while his sister, Miss Grace, a sparkling, bewitching little brunette, was a couple of years his junior.

Arthur Stamford's face beamed with pleasure upon beholding the party from Windsor, for, in spite of the fact that he had been absent for nearly two years, he still secretly nursed his love for Alice Weston.

NESTLE close to me this month, for your Uncle is sad at heart. As I am writing this the most stupendous war of all times is drenching Europe with fire and blood. All who are engaged in that combat are brothers of mine, and be they victor or vanquished, my heart bleeds for them. If those who are fighting had been blessed with common sense instead of ignorance, if they had been determined to rule themselves instead of allowing themselves to be governed by greedy, grasping, ambitious royal tyrants, they would not be spreading death and desolation over a fair and beautiful continent. As I said not long ago: "If war can be postponed for five years, there will be no more war, and the shock of battle will never again resound in the old world or the new!" War was eliminating itself, it was leaving the earth and being driven into the sky and under the seas, preparatory to disappearing forever.

An Italian recently invented a small machine, by which, as he claims, one man can at a distance of twenty miles, and in a few moments, destroy a thousand battle-ships and as many fortresses.

No power can stand against that dreadful agent of destruction, and as soon as it is perfected it is going to abolish war, and the war experts of Europe know it. War is getting too dangerous when one man can carry about with him the power that can destroy a dozen battle fleets, and render ordinary methods of fighting obsolete and useless. With soldiers and sailors impotent and powerless, and with only reason and common sense left to decide matters, what use for kings and an idle, parasitical aristocracy with which thrones are ever edged.

But something more terrible to tyrants and autocrats than implements of wholesale destruction has been haunting the fitful slumbers of Czar, Emperor, King and Kaiser, and that has been the rising flood of European democracy which was rapidly threatening to submerge and obliterate forever, dynasties and despotism, monarchies and militarism, pageantry and plunder, caste and corruption, poverty and oppression.

The rising tide of democracy has been a swelling flood, noble and inspiring, inasmuch as it has scorned narrow nationalism (the accursed thing which makes one man who lives on one side of a river hate another man because he lives on the opposite side), obliterated racial hatred, and made men see that only as they kept apart and distrusted each other could they remain flesh for cannon, exploited nuts for royal squirrels, and only as they got together hand to hand and heart to heart, could they rid themselves of royal rascals and century long oppression, the mailed hand of tyrants, the crushing heel of despotism, the slur of charity, the pangs of hunger, and the blight of poverty.

Thinking men saw and realized this and set about the noble work of enlisting the workers of Europe in the common cause of humanity, with the result that the social democrats became the leading and greatest power in the German Reichstag or parliament.

Only the pomp and circumstance of war, and the wild appeal to blind patriotism, that naturally or unnaturally follows sword rattling and drum beating, could roll back the tide of social democracy, which the curse of militarism and kingly arrogance had fostered and nurtured in the hearts of millions. The Kaiser knew it was now or never if his mighty and ambitious schemes were to be put into effect, his throne kept from annihilation. Already Europe had three republics, and the great republic of France, though not a military menace, was an object lesson that the Teutonic people were taking to heart and profiting by all too rapidly for the taste of the War Lord. The more he and his military clique of arrogant parasites talked of peace the mightier the German legions became. Even in Manila Bay during our troubles with Spain, Dewey had to threaten war e'er the Kaiser would withdraw his nose from affairs which did not concern him, and there is nothing that can happen in the remotest corner of the earth (note the Ypiranga incident which gave Huerta enough ammunition for two years and the landing of our troops at Vera Cruz and the loss of nineteen American lives) that the Kaiser is not Johnny on the spot, not with the idea of broadening the lives of his overworked and underpaid people, but to gratify his dynastic and imperialistic whims, and to saddle more securely the brutal military Prussian caste system on his patient, docile people. The militaristic machine was working to perfection. Now or never was the time to use it. The assassination of Archduke Ferdinand gave Austria the excuse to begin the long-planned operations that were to embroil Europe and open the way for German ports on the entrance to the English Channel and at Salonika on the Mediterranean, where the Suez Canal (England's highway to the East) could be closed at will, and an Austro-German Empire, o'erlapping Turkey in Asia created, thus putting an end to Russian and Slav ambitions and the menace of the United Balkan states forever.

Bismarck, after the crushing defeat administered to France by Prussia in 1870 brought United Germany into existence. Then began a wonderful period of industrial development by Germany. But, alas! wherever her growing mercantile fleet went, it found other nations ahead of it. The Kaiser wanted colonies, but he was too late; other nations had already grabbed up the choice places of the earth. He was not to be blamed for this, and though Germany wanted to expand and have a Colonial Empire, the world could not be enlarged, or people driven off the planet to satisfy her ambitions, worthy those ambitions were.

The Kaiser however, was not satisfied. He has fumed, fussed and fretted because he too could not have an empire on which the sun never sets. But he was determined to have the empire, and to get what he wanted he has drained the resources of his country to the limit to build up a mighty navy (that would some day drive Britain from the seas) as well as an enormous army, whose ceaseless tramping has for years kept the peacefully inclined nations of Europe in a state of nervous prostration. They have been playing a great game in Europe, and for forty years I have never missed a single move.

The Balkan kettle began to seethe when, six years ago, Austria grabbed and annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina, which after the Russo-Turkish war had been taken from Turkey to be administered but not annexed by Austria.

Russia, who has long constituted herself guardian of the Slav people, being herself largely Slav, was furious at Austria's treachery and arrogance, but she had not recovered from the whipping Japan gave her, and France and England were not ready to come to her assistance. Then came the Balkan war which all of you remember.

Germany and Austria wanted Turkey to win, wanted Moslem infidels to whip Christians. I want you to note this fact because it shows how little Christianity counts when greed and ambition are in the scale. To the great surprise of everyone, and the great delight of England, France and Russia, the Turk was nearly driven out of Europe. The united Balkan states capable of putting a million splendid fighting men in the field and throwing the balance of power from the triple alliance (Germany, Austria and Italy) to the triple entente (England, France and Russia), gave Germany and Austria a fit. However, the Balkan states foolishly got fighting over the division of the spoils, and left weakened but heroic Servia to stem the tide of Austrian aggression.

Prince Ferdinand, heir to the throne of Austria, known as the fire brand of Europe, a man who had incurred the hatred of the Servian people, was removed by a bullet fired by a fanatical Serb. Austria enraged, began at once to prepare for war and issued an ultimatum, which if it had been complied with would have been the end of Servia's national existence. This time Russia was strong enough to do more than protest. She ordered Austria to go easy and began to mobolize her troops, for of course she couldn't prevent Austria from doing anything until she did mobolize. Mobolize by the way, means to prepare for active service.

The Kaiser could easily have stayed Austria's hand, for at this very moment Austria had accepted England's proposals for mediation. But just when the primary causes of this great war were disappearing, the Kaiser declared war against Russia, sending too his troops across the French frontier, while still at peace with France, and hurling his huge army corps into peaceful little Belgium, in spite of the solemn vows that he had made to recognize that tiny kingdom's neutrality. This is something akin to having a man enter your house, so that he can more easily kill the man next door. The rest you know. I have gone into the causes underlying this terrible conflict at some length, so you may get a better idea of how and why this titanic struggle came about. Probably (for wars are settled quickly these days) the fighting may be over by the time this reaches your eyes—God knows I hope so.

As I said, my sympathies are with all those who are engaged and have had to suffer in this wholly unnecessary war, a war which has disgraced our common humanity and made our so-called Christianity a ghastly joke, a war which has let loose the vilest passions of men, men who haven't at heart the slightest quarrel with one another, and no possible reason or excuse for murdering one another. Surely a frightful responsibility rests with those who have precipitated this conflict, a crime against God and man.

From this dreadful carnage however, I prophesy will come good. As Sedan ushered in the French republic, so will this modern Armageddon usher in the United States of Europe, and the misrule of asinine, pompous, impossible monarchs, Kings, and Kaisers, Czars and Emperors, and all the bloody train of pestilence, carnage and ruin (a very cortege of death that ever follows in the wake of these gilded parasites) will vanish forever.

Hohenzollerns, Hapsburgs, Romanoffs have got to go. These men still believe in the divine right of Kings to govern wrong, a superstition which, alas, lingers in some spots in this country, where our money kings arrogantly assert, when intoxicated with the power of gold, that they have nothing to arbitrate. This is the last great struggle of autocracy against democracy, of human rights against palace policies. Granted that the Kaiser is an able, capable man, his ideas are medieval. He is the incarnation of force and militarism. He has exacted from his people an obedience that permitted them not to reason why but required them to do or die. People are not merely things to be governed, but each a sovereign, whose rights must be reckoned with and whose liberties must not be infringed upon. Every throne in Europe, with the exception of that of Great Britain, is supported by bayonets, and those who live by the sword must perish by it. The imperialism of Britain long ceased to be a menace. Its colonies are as independent as our own states, its markets free to the world. The imperialism of the Kaiser however is a menace to the whole world, and it has engendered a spirit of aggressiveness that must be crushed at all hazards, for a triumphant Kaiser on land and sea, would see Monroe doctrines scattered to the winds, the shadow of the War Lord darkening the universe, and the mailed fist shaking defiantly under the nose of every power, including Uncle Sam. Rampart, victorious imperialism, if not crushed now will keep the world in a state of nervous prostration for a generation or more. It is well to have a national spirit, but it must be a spirit that respects its neighbors' landmarks, and it must be a spirit that respects treaties and does not put to the sword a helpless neutral people as in the case of Belgium, trampled beneath the iron heel of military might, her people outraged, her beautiful cities burned because that little country afforded an easier access to an enemy's territory. A strange thing about this horrible war is that one third of Germany's sixty-seven million people hate it and dread victory more than defeat, because victory means another generation or two of the blood-and-iron imperialism of Bismarck, the autocratic system that means long hours and poor wages, a system they hate and despise. We should prohibit the manufacture of arms as we prohibit the manufacture of whiskey, for both are the instruments of death, and no man, or group of men, no matter how wise or good can be trusted to use or handle either. The best thing that can happen to the Kaiser (and every one of my German friends if they live but a few years will bear me out) is the defeat of his armies and the archaic blood-and-iron system of military despotism that he and his clique have imposed on his oppressed subjects. Defeat will mean a German republic, and the abolition of militarism, Prussianism and Kaiserism. The German defeat will also bring about the breaking up of the Austrian Empire and the wind up of the Happsburg dynasty. Out of the political ruins of the old empire will come the republics of Austria, Hungary and Poland and it will likewise bring the collapse of the Italian monarchy already tottering to its fall. The contagion of democracy will sweep Russia like a prairie fire. The Czar will read the handwriting on the wall and his people will demand a constitutional government with the present farcical duma converted into a parliament as truly representative as that of England and which will become republican as soon as the illiterate Slavs have become sufficiently educated to take their place in the federated states of Europe.

So, horrible as the war is, if victory perches upon the banners of those already committed to democratic ideas, and government of, for, and by the people, glorious good will come of it. But oh, the pity of it that these ends could not have been attained by reason, common sense, and cooperative thought, instead of hideous, atrocious, and detestable bloodshed.

"Come shoulder to shoulder, ere earth grows older,
The cause is spreading o'er land and sea,
Now the day breaketh, and hope awaketh,
And joy comes at last for you and me."

P. S. The world of late has had to stand still and get its throat cut to amuse one or two crack-brained monarchs who having played with their blood-killing machines for a number of years now want to see how they will work. Should the Kaiser and his steam roller crush European democracy flat, not long will it be prostrate and the very first to rise against military despotism will be the German people themselves and the murderous steam roller of butchery, which the Kaiser has evolved, will be the very instrument that will crush him and the merciless system he represents.

My views upon the war question are written right out of my heart and are the result of forty-four years of intense study of international questions and world events. If any of my German friends feel aggrieved at what I have written let them blame me and not COMFORT, as the views I've expressed are mine and mine only. My fatherland is the world and any old place I hang my hat is home sweet home to me. The earth is my mother, the Creator my father, and the heavens above are all a part of my world, my fatherland, my home. All men are my brothers. Men with my ideas do not give a rap for creeds or boundaries. All we ask is to be given a place in the sun, a little spot on God's footstool and there be allowed to live and grow physically, mentally and spiritually, ever developing the best that is in us for our own and the common good, without oppression or exploitation. I hate war, but there are some things worse than war and that is blind submission to tyrants and despots, and the hateful imperialistic ideas these monsters propagate, so that blind idiots may be led to the slaugher to further their senseless ambitions. Only a few months ago I suggested if the Mexicans could not settle their differences and develop capacity for self government it would be an excellent idea to hand a good part of that country over to the German people. That I think ought to satisfy our German readers that I love and admire them. (It may interest you to know that since this war has been on, I've read fifteen to twenty-seven newspapers daily, from seven A. M. until midnight—every two or three hours they are dropped on my bed in bunches of threes or fives.)

The Christmas season will soon be here so don't forget that Uncle Charlie's two wonderful books, one of poems and the other of songs, a source of endless joy and merriment which should be in every home, can still be had free: the poems for a club of four, the songs for only two subscriptions. See full particulars at end of this department. Don't miss it. These are the books that will make the whole year joyous.

Also Uncle Charlie's Story Book can still be had as a free premium in paper covers for a club of two subscriptions, or bound in ribbed lilac silk stiff covers for four subscriptions. New edition now out.

Now for the letters.

McRAE, ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I help mamma do the house work and do the milking, washing and ironing. I also help papa in the field some, too, for I am the only child at home, and have to be their girl-boy. I live in White county, forty miles northeast of Little Rock, the capital of our state. My home is in the country, three miles from the little town of McRae, which is on the I. M. R. R. I am very fond of music and have an organ on which I can play a little. I have two sisters and two brothers, all of whom are married, except one brother in Portland, Oregon. We have not seen him in nearly eleven years, but he is coming home in October. We had not heard a word of him in eight years and had give him up as dead, when we got a letter from him in July, 1913. He sent me a pretty ring for my birthday and mamma fifty dollars in gold. How was that for a present? Well, I guess you are all wondering what I look like. I have light yellow hair, blue gray eyes, light complexion and weigh one hundred and thirty-eight pounds. I am nearsighted and wear glasses part of the time, which don't do much good. I will let you guess my age, but I'm not quite an "old maid" yet. Uncle Charlie, I live about a mile from a house that was built a long time before the war. It used to be the stopping place for the old stage coach before this country was settled good, and it is said that lots of people were robbed and murdered there. There have been a number of human skeletons plowed up. Some people think that there is money buried there and there are several large holes where someone has come at night and dug for it.

I dearly love to do fancy work and work sofa pillows on eyelet toweling which I think is very pretty.

Would like to get some view cards from the cousins as I get very lonely sometimes. Your loving niece,

LYDIA OSBORNE.

Lydia, I am glad to hear from you, and I very much rejoice to hear that your brother has at last notified you of his existence. You of course will be overjoyed to see him, especially as you had given him up for dead, but I want to tell you if I were your mother, he would get that fifty dollars in gold back in a hurry. I would let him know that after lacerating a mother's heart, and grieving her to death for eight long years that he couldn't square himself with any old fifty bones. Of course fifty bones are always acceptable, and I wouldn't like to tell you what I wouldn't do for fifty bones, in fact I could be put in jail for all I'd be ready to do for fifty bones. But if I were upholstered with a real live son and he went and played dead for eight years, never worrying or caring whether I was alive or not, and if after lacerating and tearing my poor young trusting paternal heart, he sent me word that he wasn't dead at all. I'd write him a letter to the following effect—"Say, you've played dead for eight years, now take a tip from me, you stay dead. The only fatted calf that you'll get when you come home will be a bull dog and a load of buck shot." Now that's the kind of greeting that cruel and utterly selfish young people deserve, when they leave home and keep their parents and relatives in ignorance of their whereabouts. It is simply amazing the number of homes that are blighted by sons with the wander-lust—boys who hike off from the parental rooftree and who after many years of absence and silence, turn up with a chuckle at the door of the old homestead as if nothing had happened. The fact that mother ate out her heart for twenty years or more and grieved herself into the grave, dying with that absent loafer's name on her lips, doesn't worry the wanderer at all. People who leave home and forget to write or rather quit writing to their dear old mothers and devoted sisters who have spent years of time and oodles of money preparing them for the battle of life, ought to be tied to a whipping post and lashed into mince meat. It is the refinement of torture to keep loved ones in suspense. There might have been some excuse for it in the old days when ships took months to cross the ocean and travel was fraught with danger. The days before electricity, fifty thousand ton steamships, wireless telegraphy, aeroplanes, telephones and picture postal cards, there might I say, have been some excuse then, but there is no excuse now except cold-blooded, selfish indifference. Now boys let me read you a lecture. I mean you who are about to leave home or you who have already left home. Have a home letter day, once a week if possible, but certainly not less than once a month. Every Monday is my home letter day. I have a dear sister who lives many thousand miles away, and for twenty-six years I have never missed a single week in which I did not send her a letter or a card and there has never been a week in all those years that I did not receive a line from her. If I were too sick to write I always found someone willing to drop a line for me. Nothing is ever allowed to interfere with that Monday letter. Once a steamer sank that was bringing a letter from her to me, but the next time I go in the Atlantic swimming I expect to find that letter. You don't have to tell the girls to write home, unless they have been dragged down into the gutters of disgrace. There is nothing more delightful than writing and receiving letters from home. The fact that you are not a gifted scribe and your handwriting is poor makes no difference with mother. The worst bunch of hen tracks that were ever made, as long as they come from a beloved son will be pure joy to that dear white-headed soul, who risked her life to bring you into the world and who would risk her life again a hundred times to shield you from danger. Probably these lines will come to the notice of many who haven't written home for years and my remarks may spur them to get in touch with the old folks before it is too late. If there are any of you who have caused mother and other loved ones needless anguish by years of silence, take up your pen instantly and plead for forgiveness for all the heart aches you have caused ere it is too late.

DICKSON, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I would like to furnish several families with fresh eggs direct. How could I manage to get them direct to the consumer? W. T. H. DUNNEGAN.

P. S. I would esteem it a favor to put me in touch with a good market.

Friend Dunnegan, I never was in the egg business. I am afraid you came to a very poor person for the advice you seek. The only time that I ever succeeded in getting an egg direct to anyone was in a theater. There was a man trying to sing a song and his singing got on my nerves to such an extent that I threw an egg at him, and it went direct to the mark hitting him right on the bugle and closing up both his eyes. Now friend Dunnegan, that is my only experience in delivering eggs direct. If you want to deliver your eggs in that way, I have no objection, only please don't ask me to help you. The only other way I know of to deliver them direct will be to hire an air ship and drop them over the side on to the roofs of your customers' houses. If your farm is one side of the mountain and you have a customer the other side, the only thing to do would be to have a tunnel driven through the mountain to your customer's back door. These are about all the suggestions I can make as to direct delivery. What however is your idea in wanting to deliver eggs direct to people? Would it hurt the eggs at all if you had to carry them around a few curves and corners? It doesn't hurt an egg, my dear friend, to be carried around a few corners, and it doesn't add to its quality to carry it in a straight line. Eggs are eggs, and if you get them to us within a few years of the date of their birth, and don't ask us to pay more than a dollar apiece for them, we the consuming public have no right to kick. The Goat informs me that I have entirely misunderstood your postal card, and that you want me to find you a market for your

IN & AROUND The HOME

CONDUCTED BY MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON

Christmas Gifts You Can Make for Every One in the Family

AMONG the ever useful and always needed little articles which you can make even now, are pincushions; for that any one ever had too many pins it is impossible to believe.

From odds and ends of silk and velvet, apples and tomatoes have been made for years, but a bunch of carrots, made of yellow or orange velvet and tied together with raffia is rather of a novelty.

CARROT PINCUSHION.

The shops are showing very expensive cushions which can be duplicated at home with little expense.

For instance, one sees beautiful bisque and china dolls, with their bodies added to, stuffed and shaped and then the completed figure dressed in exquisite old-fashioned styles.

The wide hoopskirt going over and completely covering the cushion upon which the doll is set.

These dresses are made of fancy silk, flounced with narrow ruffles of lace and rosettes of ribbon. A little pelisse of satin is thrown around the shoulders, and sometimes an old-fashioned hat or poke bonnet placed on the head.

Such a cushion, dressed as girls used to, would be sure to please any grandmother, as the dainty lady, besides being useful, would also serve to revive pleasant thoughts of the days of grandmother's youth.

DOLL'S HEAD CUSHION.

Dolls' heads can also be used for cushions and in different other ways.

The little one shown here has for a base a two and one half inch pasteboard covered circle. Only about a yard of four-or five-inch ribbon and a couple of ivory rings for the little cap will be needed.

Cut off about three inches for the cap, or as much as is needed. The selvage forms the lower edge and the ribbon is folded over and seamed up both sides. Then the corners are caught down over the rings which are handy for holding safety pins.

PIN TRAY.

Gather both edges of the balance of the ribbon and sew to the covered circle and around the doll's neck.

For friends who admit a liking for pin trays one can make a very pretty one in a half hour. Either a pair of round or oblong embroidery hooks can be used. Cover each of these by winding closely with No. 2 satin ribbon.

Then over the inner hoops stretch and sew a piece of fancy ribbon or silk, trim the edges off and slip on the outer ring.

Finish with full rosettes of ribbon and little glass push tacks.

Knitter's Apron

This apron is one of the handiest articles that a knitter or crocheter in wools, can use and makes a most useful and inexpensive gift.

Take a square of any pretty lawn or dimity muslin, run a hem at either end. Cut a circular piece of your goods about 14 inches in diameter, run a beading all around the edge and fasten this circle to the center of your square by sewing around in a circle of about four inches. This forms a bottom to your pocket. Run a ribbon in one of the hems and a narrow ribbon through the beading on the circle and draw up to form a circular pocket which will hold your ball of wool and keep it from rolling away. The apron itself of course is used to fold the work up in and the ribbon in the end can fasten around the waist when working.

KNITTER'S APRON.

Sachets

One can indulge friends who have a fondness for perfumes very easily. As a set of little sachets made of little inch and a half squares of satin come in sets of six, with little gilt safety pins attached all ready to pin into a waist. The sachets, of six different colors, each perhaps embroidered with a tiny blossom, such as a deep red rose on a rose satin, blue forget-me-not on a soft green, a daisy on a pale blue and so on, packed in a little box make a most dainty holiday remembrance.

HAND-PAINTED SACHET.

Beautiful little flower sachets are also shown and are especially pretty sachets for lingerie.

Tiny satin roses are made and set in rosettes of lace, which cover the real sachet. Pansies and wild roses are also made. The pansies with their yellow and two purple petals, or all yellow, white or purple velvet, with painted centers and edges.

The roses are lovely of very soft satin ribbon tied into knots, the same as the ribbon on the ends of the pin tray, to form the petals. On the back of each flower is a little satin bag which holds the sachet powder.

A larger sachet for handkerchief box or drawers may be fashioned of a triangle of silk or satin and decorated by either jointing or embroidery.

This is filled solidly excepting the two upper corners, which are folded over and held in place with a little bow.

Collapsible Sewing Basket

Both of these sewing baskets, if untied will lie perfectly flat, and for this reason are useful for any person who does more or less traveling.

SEWING BASKET.

They also make acceptable gifts to send away, as they can be mailed flat.

The first simple little work case is made of pasteboard and can be covered with material of any sort, providing it will give good wear.

Two sets of pasteboard will be needed and it will perhaps be best to cut paper pattern and get them exact before proceeding. Both should be exact squares, say 12 inches, fold in two inches on each side, this will be the depth of basket. Now cut enough out of the corners, so they will just meet on a slight slant. This will be the pattern for the under part.

Then take another 12-inch square, fold in half both ways, so as to get the center, then place this piece of paper, folded twice on first square and fold the center towards the corner and crease a line which will run diagonally from one side to the other of the eight-inch square on the first pattern.

Fold another diagonal line where the center point comes. Cut from first diagonal line on both sides towards the edge, taking off an inch from the center. Now unfold, the lines forming center square, should be just large enough to set in the square of the first pattern, cornerwise, fold the corners back as shown in illustration. Cut more out where corners come together if necessary. Then cut from pasteboard, making the following squares separate and overcasting together after covering.

Lace together with silk cord, making holes where the corners of the inner square comes together and in the sides and corners of the outer squares. Fit with pockets, emery, scissors, needle-case, or as completely as one wishes.

Three double linen, ribbon bound 12-inch circles will be required for the next case. These are divided into six and stretched to each other, six rings being sewed to the inner circle, through which a cord is run and tied, drawing the case into shape as pictured.

Sewing Basket of Embroidery Hoops

Another novel way of making a basket for all the sewing articles, has four, six-inch, round embroidery hoops for the foundation. Each hoop has a piece of silk stretched over it plainly for the inside, while the outside is covered with three-inch Dresden ribbon, gathered on to the hoop and drawn up in the center under a silk covered bottom, around the rims is a full ruche of narrow ribbon. The four hoops, after being covered in this way are arranged and attached to a square silk-covered cardboard. Bows are also placed at the corners where the hoops meet. Fit with the necessary fixings attached with narrow ribbons.

Unbreakable Doll

A couple of balls of white darning cotton half-dozen small bells, a couple of yards of baby ribbon and perhaps an old doll's head, are all that is needed to fashion this cute little doll.

UNBREAKABLE DOLL

First wind cotton about twenty times around a cardboard twelve inches long. Slip off and tie with ribbon about four inches from one end. Divide these ends and make two braids, then place on Dolly's head, dividing the cotton and bringing down on all sides tie around the neck with a cord. Bring the ends out half on each side and finish with bells and ribbons for the arms.

Wind more cotton over eight-inch cardboard, place over the shoulders and tie in place, then finish neck and waist with ribbon and bells and even off the ends.

For the Baby

For a baby a doll's head can be worked into a soft ball, which with additions can also be rattle and teething ring.

The little hood is of single crochet and also the ball which can be made by beginning with a chain 6, join ring 15 singles in first round then 2 singles in every other stitch, third row 1 single in each stitch and 2 where needed, 6 rounds of 1 single in each stitch. Then gradually draw in by omitting stitches.

FOR THE BABY.

Stuff the ball with wool, trim with ribbon and cover an elastic with frilled ribbon to which fasten a large ivory ring.

Another ball, may be made from the wrist of old white gloves, wash and cut into six or eight sections in general shape like sections of an orange, so that they will have a round shape when fastened together. Buttonhole the edges with bright-colored silkateen and crochet them together. Stuff the ball quite firmly with cotton before finishing the last section.

A Hat-Brush

A nice hat-brush for big brother may be made in much the same way as the doll, only for this one should use raffia; a skewer or stem of an old pipe can be used to make the handle firm. Use an old kid glove cut in strips to bind in place, then finish end of handle with sealing wax.

Cut two half circles of kid or velvet, buttonhole them all around, spread and flatten the raffia in whisk broom shape, fit the kid up close to the handle, overcast edges together with silk, then along the straight edge catch through from one side to the other with strong twist, after which even the edges of the raffia.

Paper Case

Here is part of a letter from a southern girl who evidently take pleasure, in carefully planning her gifts. "Last Christmas," she writes, "I planned a surprise for an old friend who had married and gone to live on a homestead. Knowing she probably had little money for magazines, I made a case of coarse crash toweling, lined and bordered with Turkey red, with word COMFORT worked across the front.

"This I mounted on a piece of a broomstick gilded, with red silk cord for hanging. Then I sent my last year's Comforts, with comments tucked in between the pages and specially good recipes marked, which I had tried. She wrote that the magazines were a 'gold mine' of pleasure and help to her, so each month since I have mailed her my paper." This idea is certainly a good one which others might copy, for many magazines which would be of special value to folks living in isolated localities, are allowed to be destroyed, or accumulates in the attic.

New Bags

Next we illustrate two of the newest bags; the first is designed especially to hang on one's wrist and hold ball of wool or cotton.

It is comparatively easy to make and can be of different sizes, just large enough to hold one's wool or if ribbon or silk 10 inches in width is used, the bag will be of ample size to hold an ordinary piece of work.

One yard of ribbon this width will be needed. Cut off just enough to cover two pasteboard circles one and one half inches in diameter, on both sides. Seam the ends of the ribbon together and from seam form two plaits turning towards the center and running seven inches down each side. Catch in place by making French knots as shown of contrasting shade of silk, or feather stitching.

KNITTER'S BAG.

Leave four or five inches of each selvage, measuring from base of plaits, plain, then run in gathering thread draw up and sew one of the covered circles in each side of the bag. Two ribbons or pieces of silk can be joined together to get the required width as was done in this bag, a rose flowered ribbon being used for the center bordered with plain old blue satin. The combination was especially pretty finished with the French knots in pink.

The second bag shows a very good way to combine ribbon and silk.

About one yard of six and one half inch fancy ribbon will be needed if one uses a six-inch embroidery hoop. One half yard of silk, one and one half yards of silk cord or ribbon for strings, nine ivory or brass rings and a bit of cotton for the little balls.

Cut from the silk a sixteen-inch circle, using the trimmings to cover the embroidery hoop. Then turn in tiny edge of circle, gather, and sew to embroidery hoop. Cut three-inch circle and make cotton stuffed ball and sew to center. Allow two inches of the ribbon for making the other balls, then divide the balance into three pieces. Sew the ends of each piece together to form points, then join the selvages. Sew the selvages of the lower points to the embroidery ring, finish the top by sewing the rings, three on each piece of ribbon, just below the points and run in the cords. Make small balls to finish the lower points as shown.

WORK BAG.

Bag of Crochet and Ribbon

Another bag which is very attractive requires only a half yard or less of figured ribbon, three or four inches in width, and a spool of silkateen. Join the ribbon then beginning at the seam make 1 double crochet into the selvage, ch. 3, 1 d. c. Work around in this way taking the stitches into the ribbon an equal distance apart. Join to first d. c., then ch. 6, 1 d. c., over second d. c., in first row. Make enough rows in this way to make the bag the required size. Then overcast lower selvages of the ribbon together and work one row of spaces across the bottom. Into this tie a three-inch fringe of silkateen.

Finish the top by crocheting over small rings through which run a made cord or ribbons.

Christmas Packages

Besides the thoughtful selection of each gift care should be taken in wrapping and tying up each article, however small, in an attractive way. A little tissue paper, ribbon and a few stickers will do wonders, or if the Christmas seals cannot be had, one can substitute swastikas and stars cut from red paper.

For the Christmas Tree

In the country if suitable decorations for the tree cannot be bought, a lot of bright new pennies, hung up by means of red baby ribbon attached to the coins by a bit of sealing wax, will make a novel and showy trimming; these can afterwards be distributed. Speaking of pennies brings to mind a delicate and pleasing way to make a gift of money.

Buy a small inexpensive photo frame and then fold the bill so that nothing but the portrait upon it will show.

In a Big Family

Where presents are distributed Christmas morning it will make a little excitement and extra fun, to have all presents intended for a certain person tied with a special color, then packages should all be wrapped in plain paper and piled on the dining table. In the morning each person receives an envelope containing a bit of ribbon. After all the outer wrappings are removed and packages sorted they are claimed according to color.

Notice

Please note that patterns for any of the articles illustrated this month cannot be supplied, and they really are not necessary for even if there are slight differences from the original designs it is of no consequence for often a clever worker can make changes which will really be an improvement on the idea. So in making your Christmas plans, change and rearrange to meet your needs, and these columns will have fulfilled their mission if COMFORT readers are helped to give Christmas joy and good cheer by utilizing ordinary and inexpensive materials.

Let us each try to make this our best Christmas so far.

The Man with Two Coats

Or, Matilda Brown's Thanksgiving

By E. Mandeville Rogus

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MATILDA BROWN walked down Mrs. Hill's front steps, and stopping at the granite post untied Martha's hitching rope, and threw it into the bottom of the buggy. Then she turned the mare's head, and climbing stiffly in gathered up the reins. Her plump, cheery face wore a smile of satisfaction as she chucked to Martha. Then she pressed her hand against her pocket, and her smile deepened.

It was the afternoon before Thanksgiving Day, and the air was heavy with approaching snow. Winter had set in early in those New Hampshire hills, and Matilda noticed that ice was already beginning to form along the sides of the Pemigewasset river, as it flowed silently by, a little below the road. The birches showed white and leafless against the dark background of evergreens on the mountain-side, and the masses of ferns and sumac, so beautiful and rich in color but a short time before were now brown and withered.

Matilda Brown slapped the reins on Martha's broad back, and urged the reluctant mare along with her voice. Already the twilight was closing in on them, and here and there a stray snowflake fluttered in the air like a belated butterfly.

Martha gingerly picked her way along the frozen road. She resented being kept away from her warm stall and evening meal.

At the end of two miles Matilda guided Martha into the main street of Plymouth. As they ambled along, between farm wagons, delivery carts and surreys they passed the shop of Miss Hester, the little, lame milliner. In the center of the window, in the place of honor, was a purple velvet bonnet. On the side, out of a rosette of black lace rose a bunch of variegated pansies. Matilda gave the bonnet one long, lingering look, and then turned her head resolutely away. Down the street they jogged until they reached a brightly illuminated shop, over the door of which a large sign proclaimed to the world that here could be found "Fits and Styles to Please."

Matilda walked into the shop, her face again wearing its beaming smile.

"Good day, Mr. Jones," she said. "I've come fer thet great-coat."

A genial smile broke over Mr. Jones's rotound face. "Doin' Heber's shoppin' fer him, air yer, Mrs. Brown? Wall, it's a wise husband thet lets his wife look out fer his comforts. As fer his luxuries he'd best attend ter them himself," and he chuckled until his fat little body shook, and Matilda was afraid he would choke.

"Thar ain't been much in the way of luxuries fer the Brown family this long while," she answered, still smiling though a serious look had crept into her gray eyes. "Times ain't what they used ter be."

Mr. Jones wrapped the coat in paper, tied the string, and handed the bundle to Matilda.

"Thet's true, Mrs. Brown," he assented. "We all feel it, some more, some less. I hope Heber finds his coat right," and he took the handful of crumpled bills that Matilda held out to him.

"Much obliged ter yer. Looks like we'll be goin' ter meeting on runners termorrer. It's feelin' mighty wintry this afternoon," and he held the door open for her to pass out. "Good night, give my regards ter Heber."

When Matilda turned in at the gate of the red farmhouse she, Martha and the buggy were white with snow.

She gave the reins to Peter, the hired man, lifted the bundle out of the buggy, and shaking the snow off her shoulders, opened the door into the brightly lighted kitchen.

"Yer late, Matilda," expostulated a tall, thin man with stooping shoulders. "It's nigh on ter six o'clock."

He was a man close to seventy, with gray hair and side whiskers and kindly blue eyes, set deep under bushy eyebrows.

"Yes, Heber, I went ter Plymouth ter do some shoppin'. These winter afternoons close in quite sudden-like, and it's dark before yer know whar yer air."

Matilda deposited the bundle on the white oil-skin-covered table, and untied the string. She pushed back the paper, and lifting out the coat shook it vigorously.

"Thar, Heber," she said triumphantly. "Thar's yer coat!"

"Why, Tilly!" exclaimed Heber breathlessly, "How d'yer ever do it? I ain't given yer no more money fer thet coat since the end of August when the apple crop failed."

"I've been savin' up too, Heber." Matilda looked at her husband, her gray eyes as full of love as when she plighted her troth to him forty years ago. "Thar's egg, and chicken, and turkey money in thet coat, as well. I sold the last turkey ter Mrs. Hill this afternoon, and thet give me jest enough. I hope it fits, Heber," and she held the coat up as high as she could.

Heber slipped his arms in it, and turned to a cracked mirror hanging between the windows.

"Couldn't fit no better if it had been made fer me, Tilly," he replied. "It sure air nice. I'll feel like a 'ristercrat when I walk inter meetin' termorrer, and no mistake." Heber passed his hands over the front of the coat, and then almost broke his neck trying to see his back.

"Thet old one was a disgrace. I'm mighty glad yer don't hev ter wear thet no more—it was every color under the sun, and then some more besides. I call it disrespectful ter the Lord ter wear such clothes ter His House." Matilda's plump, little figure radiated happiness as she untied her hood, and buttoning on an apron began the preparations for supper.

"It is if yer hev a better, but when it's the best ye hev I guess the Lord don't lay up yer shabby clothes against yer, if yer heart ain't spotted and worn," retorted Heber as he slipped off the coat. He carried it to the closet in the entry where he hung it up, and then coming back to the kitchen settled himself in the armchair near the lamp.

Mr. Jones's predictions came true, and Heber and Matilda found Martha hitched to the sleigh when they stepped out on the vine-covered porch the following morning. Heber was wearing his new coat, and his weather-beaten face wore a guileless smile of satisfaction. Matilda stood beside him, her last year's bonnet securely tied on with a white, knitted veil.

"Is yer coat warm, Heber?" she asked as they ambled along on their way to the meeting-house.

"Warm as warm, Tilly," he replied enthusiastically. "I ain't been as comfortable in years."

"Thet old coat's about ready fer the rag bag," declared Matilda. "I guess I'll put it in the rag carpet I'm makin' fer the settin'-room."

"Don't cut up thet coat yet, Tilly—it's got lots of wear in it still, and it'll serve to save this one in bad weather," and Heber gently jerked the reins to let Martha know that there was someone on the other end.

After service was over the Browns stood for a few minutes in the porch of the church exchanging greetings with their friends.

"Ain't it terruble about the poor Martins!" exclaimed Ellen Smith to Matilda. Ellen was the harbinger of the bad news of the neighborhood. She was an emaciated old maid, with an unnaturally brown false front, and unnaturally white false teeth which didn't fit.

"I ain't heard. What 's the matter?" asked Matilda solicitously.

"Their house burned down last night, and it was jes' all they could do ter get out in their night clothes," explained Ellen, delighted at being able to tell of the disaster to a new ear.

"How dreadful!" ejaculated Matilda. "Didn't they save anything?"

"They only jes' got themselves out, let alone anything else," answered Ellen, shaking her head. "The house went up like tinder. It was providential they weren't all burned ter a crisp. If it hadn't been fer the hired man they would hev been. He smelt the smoke, and got in at the winder, and wakened them."

"Where air they now?" asked Matilda.

"The Allens took them in las' night—they were the nearest—but I don't know what the Martins air goin' ter do, poor things. Mrs. Martin seems sort of dazed like, and jes' sits and wrings her hands. Purty hard in the face of a cold winter, and with no one ter turn ter," and Ellen held out her hand to the pastor who just then appeared beside them.

"I've been telling Mrs. Brown about the Martins," she explained. "I was sayin', it's purty hard ter be left without a home and destitute in weather like this."

"The hand of the Lord does bear heavy at times," responded Mr. Strong, a thin, smooth-faced man in a frock coat and white tie. "But we must never forget that whom He loveth He chasteneth."

Both women nodded their assent to this doctrine, thankful deep in their hearts that chastening had not come to them in the form of fire, and Matilda walked away to join Heber, who was folding Martha's blanket.

"I'm mighty sorry fer the Martins," she remarked, after the laprobe had been tucked in, and Martha's head turned toward home. "They ain't got so much as a stitch between them."

"Yes," answered Heber, absently. "It's purty hard—how old air the children?"

Matilda considered a moment before replying. "Thar air three, I think. The youngest one, Charlie, was two years younger than Joe,—he'd hev been seven this February."

A silence fell between them, broken only by the sound of Martha's feet as she crunched through the crisp snow. Joe was the legacy their only daughter had left to them when, after many years of wooing, she had married a traveling salesman from Boston. She had died the following year, leaving a baby boy, with her blue eyes, and sunny smile. At the father's request the old couple had taken the dimpled, gurgling child into their lonely lives. Matilda never complained of the extra work that came with him, but brought him safely through measles, and chicken pox, breathing a sigh of relief when these childish diseases were behind them. Then Joe came down with pneumonia. Matilda tended the little sufferer with anxious, agonized care. She never left his bedside day or night, and when his meager strength failed, and his spirit slipped away to join his waiting mother, she collapsed utterly, and it was weeks before the cheery kitchen saw her again.

Then she took up life's burden, determined to be bright and happy for the sake of Heber, who, she knew, felt the boy's loss as keenly as she.

"I'm goin' ter drive over ter the Allens this afternoon, and give Henry Martin this coat," remarked Heber.

Matilda turned quickly to him. "Oh, Heber! not your new coat!" she exclaimed in a shocked tone. "Give him the old one—it's got lots of wear in it yet!"

Heber shook his head resolutely. "It ain't good enough," he answered.

"It's good enough fer Henry Martin arter the way he treated yer last June about the hay," retorted Matilda, her cheeks flaming, and her gray eyes flashing fire.

"Henry told me he was sorry about thet," answered Heber, quietly.

"He wasn't sorry enough ter make up yer loss ter yer," persisted Matilda. "The old coat's plenty good enough fer him ter knock around in. He'd ruin a handsome one like thet in no time doin' chores in it."

For a moment Heber did not answer. Then he said in a low voice, "Them as give ter the poor, lend ter the Lord. I ain't goin' ter lend the Lord sech a lookin' coat as thet."

Matilda sat silent, while a look of defeat settled over her patient face. Her mind traveled back over the long summer months and the hours of toil she had spent tending the chickens and turkeys, glorying over each egg that she found, exulting over the fine appearance of each young chicken, and calculating the amount each meant in bringing nearer the ultimate goal. Then she remembered how happy she had been when her dream of securing the precious coat by Thanksgiving Day had been realized.

"It ain't fer me ter complain," she thought. "The coat belongs ter him, and he's the one ter suffer."

Then a vision of the purple velvet bonnet in Miss Hester's window flashed across her mind. Two fugitive tears stole slowly down her lined cheeks and were lost in the white knitted veil.

Martha turned in through the white gate posts, and stopped before the porch. Heber twisted the reins around the whip, as it stood in its socket and called to Peter. Then he got out, and followed Matilda into the house.

"Tilly, dear," he whispered, as he put his arm around her plump, sturdy little form, "It ain't easy—don't make it harder fer me."

Matilda laid her gray head against his shoulder, while tear after tear coursed down her cheeks. Then she drew away from his encircling arms, and groped her way up the stairs to her room. She took off her wraps and laid them on the bed. Then she untied the knitted white veil, and unpinned her bonnet. For a moment she stood looking at its faded flowers, and stained ribbon. She straightened out a crumpled leaf, and smoothed the ribbon where the veil had crushed it down. Then she placed it on the bed beside her coat.

For a moment she stood motionless, looking at a photograph of a sweet-faced boy, which hung on the wall over the bed, then she walked out of the room, crossed the hall, and gently pushed open the door of the room opposite.

The room was dark, and very cold, and she shivered involuntarily as the chill struck her. She walked across the room, and raised the green shade. The bright sunshine streamed in over the little white bed, and fell full on a battered rocking horse. Matilda glanced at it, and a sob rose in her throat.

She crossed the room again, and opening a door, stood gazing in at the closely packed shelves. A strong odor of camphor permeated the room, deepening as Martha lifted down a large white bundle, and carrying it across the room deposited it on the bed.

She unpinned it rapidly, and unwrapping it, drew out a blue sailor suit which she held up to the light.

"It'll jes' about fit him," she thought. "It ain't doin' anyone any good here, and he might as well hev the use of it."

Her stiff, trembling hands took out garment after garment, which she shook out, inspected, and laid one on top of the other. At last she reached the bottom of the bundle where another package lay tied up by itself in white paper. She took it out and slowly untied it. It was a little white corduroy suit which she had made for Joe out of his mother's wedding dress. For a moment she stood looking at it, the tears streaming down her white cheeks, then she clasped it to her bosom.

"I'll wait till next summer ter give him this," she thought. "He wouldn't wear it this winter, it ain't warm enough."

With tender, loving hands she tied the little suit up again, and laid it gently back on the shelf. Then she gathered up the pile of clothes, and went back to her own room.

The Browns' Thanksgiving dinner that day was an unusually silent one. Matilda was absent minded, and ate practically nothing and Heber, although he conversed spasmodically about the sermon, and the weather found it difficult to keep up the one-sided conversation. Both were relieved when the meal was over.

"I'm goin' with yer, Heber," announced Matilda, appearing a while later with her hat and coat on, and a large bundle in her arms. "I want ter give Mrs. Martin these things fer Charlie."

Heber looked at his wife for a moment before he understood.

"They were Joe's," she said, tremulously, "but they weren't doin' him no good whar they were, and probably Charlie will be glad of them."

Heber stooped down, and putting his arms around her, kissed the faded cheek. Then he slipped on the old coat of many colors, and turned up the frayed collar; the new coat hung carefully over his arm. He opened the door, and together they walked out into the bright winter sunlight, and climbed into the waiting sleigh.

because they yield one hundred dollars per acre as against smaller profits from other crops. Peas for the cannery yield well also and make an early harvest enabling one to raise two crops in one year. Cucumbers, string beans, and sweet corn yield more than one hundred dollars but cannot be raised in large quantities owing to the greater labor of harvesting. An acre or two of each suffices for one farm. Michigan is the bean and pickle state you know.

This rather sketchy description I have written applies to the southern portions where there is better land. I understand that further north the soil does not permit such variety and some places are utterly worthless.

Perhaps if this is printed, you would be interested to learn of our particular farm. I surely wish I could give you all a picture of our home. As I said before our place is partly within the limits of Lakeview and the house is located where the road bends, placing it at one end of the principal street in town. We can look up the tree-bordered avenue for half a mile till the street turns again to go round the lake and our gaze brings us against another big white house. To walk along the sidewalk is a pleasure; the residences are well kept and would grace the residential section of much larger towns. The business buildings are of brick and stone, nearly all put up in 1894 after the town had been burned out. A few steps down a side street toward the east brings one to the edge of beautiful Lake Tamarack which forms an important factor in the amusements of Lakeview's young and also some of the older ones. Fish are plentful, although the lake is not deep. Our farm does not quite border the water as the railroad comes between, but it is only a few rods from the house and many a happy time have the children spent in and on it.

This year the cultivated portion of our farm has been rented as that had been the arrangement the former owner had made and the crops put in are potatoes, corn and navy beans. The wheat, oats and hay have been harvested, the hay yielding at an estimate from three to four tons per acre. The wheat was sown thin but filled well and averaged twenty-two bushels, while the oats were blown down and lost out that way. It went sixty bushels and I never saw such a heavy stand of oats in my life; that's why the first rain and wind that came along when it had attained its growth, knocked it flat. My daughter, who is five feet six inches found it reached her shoulders in places.

Long live COMFORT and the work which Uncle Charlie is accomplishing through it.

MRS. A. T. ENGLERTH.

LOXEY, ALA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and enjoy COMFORT Sisters' Corner.

Our home is in Baldwin County, Southern Alabama. We came here from Willamette Valley, Oregon, on account of suffering from rheumatism, and this climate has certainly helped us a great deal.

This is also a good climate for people who are afflicted with asthma and hay fever.

Although Alabama is an old settled state, fifteen years ago in Baldwin county there were very few settlers; and those who did live here, made their living by keeping cattle and sheep. Now the county is settling up mostly by Northern people.

We have the finest winter climate in the world; the summers are warm, but there is most always a cool breeze blowing from the Gulf of Mexico or Mobile Bay and the nights are always cool with no mosquitoes to keep you from sleep.

Land is cheap and a great many large tracts are being set out to satsuma, oranges and figs. All kinds of vegetables grow here and talk about watermelons, the sweetest and most delicious I ever tasted are grown here in southern Alabama.

Wells are from thirty to sixty feet deep around here and the softest water ever found not excepting rain-water. We like the Southland very much and the people are very hospitable and kind, but we can't say we like Alabama laws. No law to keep up cattle, sheep or hogs, even a cross bull can run at large, and the railroad company does no fencing in this state. They can run through your farm and the farmer has to fence their right of way.

We haven't woman suffrage yet in Alabama, but hope we will have soon. In my next letter I would like to tell the sisters of the beautiful shade trees we have here, such as the umbrella trees, magnolias, camphor trees and live oaks. And the pretty song birds, the meadow larks and mocking birds. Now for a few hints.

Pin a newspaper round the churn when churning to keep the cream from splashing on the floor.

To make the hands smooth and white, also for chapped hands, take one half pint of cider vinegar, add one ounce of saltpeter and rub on hands.

I have black hair, blue gray eyes, weigh one hundred and sixty-three pounds, five feet five inches tall and am the same age as Uncle Charlie only he is fourteen days older than I. My birthday comes on October ninth.

My letter is long but would like to say a word in regard to those who are Christians. I have heard ministers ask those who were Christians to stand and many good people would remain seated. Now if you ask those who are seated, if they are sinners they will answer "yes" and do you go to the Lord in prayer? They will answer "yes." Now if Jesus came to save sinners and the Bible says, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out," I can't see why those who remained seated are not Christians, for the Lord Jesus will save every sinner that comes to Him.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters, I beg to remain a COMFORT friend, MRS. P. S. HENDRY.

LAWTON, R. R. 3, OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have seen a number of letters from this state, but none from this part. I like the letters describing different places and industries.

I live one mile from the corporation of Lawton. This town was twelve years old the 6th of last August and had a grand three-day celebration. On the last day there was a big parade, which included some Indians, and all the soldiers (except one company) of Fort Sill with their artillery such as horses, big canon, camp wagons, etc. Moving pictures of the parade were taken by Pathe's Weekly. On August 6, 1901, the government sold one half sections of land for town lots and when Lawton was two days old it contained most every kind of business and several thousand people. Of course there were no wood or brick buildings, everything in tents, therefore it was called the White City, and a city that never was a town.

Until 1901 this was a vast unsettled prairie, excepting Fort Sill, the Indians and a few cattlemen the only inhabitants.

When I was a very small girl my parents moved from Texas to the Indian Territory (which of course is Oklahoma now) and settled about fifty miles from here and about three miles from the line of this new Oklahoma which was unsettled then. The next year my parents and some of the neighbors came here to Fort Sill in covered wagons for a Fourth of July celebration. I can remember enough to know the Indians dress much more like white people now. Then you seldom saw even the men with citizens' clothes and now it is the reverse. Then all had the feathers and paint and some of the prettiest and finest buckskin beaded suits. I was at the Comanche Indian school which is one mile from Lawton, several years ago on February 22 at an entertainment appropriate to the day, and it was fine. The children went through so many pretty drills. There is also a nice Indian church about one mile from the school. I have attended services there and also religious services at the school. The Indians here are most all Kiowas and Comanches, and have been called the uncivilized tribes, but they are civilized citizens now. There are a few Apache Indians here yet. For years they have been held here in the Fort Sill reservation as prisoners of war, but Geronimo, their noted chief and warrior died some time ago, and their new chief and others got the government to free them, and all that wished to leave went to New Mexico last year.

Fort Sill is four miles from Lawton. Four years ago Congress appropriated money for a new fort and many costly buildings were put up one mile west of the old fort and they now have a macadamized road between the two.

It is a treat to most strangers and visitors here to see the fort and watch the soldiers drill and practise. They have what they call the School of Fire in the fall and then there is a lot of shooting and drilling.

On the 30th of May they usually have a program, consisting of polo and push ball games, baseball, shooting off the big guns, etc., all by the soldiers and officers. Of course there is speaking, band music and grave decorating.

I have never been a complete shut-in, but believe I can sympathize with them very well as I have suffered a great deal. Had an operation for chronic appendicitis. I am also troubled with rheumatism, catarrh, chilblains, nervousness, weak eyes, and other troubles, in fact it seems I have or have had half the ills and pains one can mention.

I wonder if any of the unmarried sisters are stenographers. I worked as one two years and enjoyed it, but had to quit on account of my health. It has been over five years since I worked any. I have one sister younger than myself and no brothers. Sister has been a stenographer nearly three years and likes the work.

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all COMFORT readers.

MISS MINNIE RAY.

Heart-to-Heart Talk by Our Publisher

THIS is the Twenty-sixth Anniversary of COMFORT'S Birthday, and it is with great pleasure and no little pride that I take advantage of this auspicious occasion to have a little heart-to-heart talk with you, the members of our great circle of readers.

COMFORT has now traveled one notch beyond the quarter century mark and that is not only a respectable but a venerable age for a magazine to attain in these days of stress and change, when so many publications, after a fitful existence, perish miserably, leaving nought but the bleached bones of dead hopes to cover the thorny and perilous highways that lead to the goal of literary success.

Many people, especially those who have but a superficial knowledge of the magazine field, would doubtless be prompted to ask why one magazine "dies in the borning" while another lives, flourishes amazingly and increases its popularity from year to year.

The answer is very simple. We are attracted to a certain man above all others because of his winning and magnetic personality, his tender sympathy and consideration for others, his bluff, hearty and engaging manner and democratic viewpoint. Such a man draws all men unto him. On the other hand there are men who repel us by their aloofness, their lack of warmth and spontaneity.

What is true of men is in a broad sense true of publications. One magazine enters the home and instinctively we recognize it as a friend and we welcome it as an honored guest vibrant with the sympathies that weld hearts and forge ties of universal kin. On the other hand, perhaps a more expensive journal lies upon the home table, interesting, instructive and attractive in its resplendent cover, admirable in its artistic and literary makeup, and yet with all its fine qualities it makes no deep impression nor vital appeal to our sympathies, touches no reciprocal chord in our hearts and is merely a thing of print, paper and bookish elegance.

We turn its pages mechanically, absorb its contents, then cast it aside. Not once has it stirred the heart, quickened the pulse or kindled one holy enthusiasm in our breast. Not once has it inspired us to go on the firing line where right and wrong struggle for supremacy, where the battles of humanity are fought and the race enabled to move another step forward in its onward and upward course.

In the making of COMFORT, I determined from the first that it should differ as widely as possible from the ordinary, conventional publications, most of which resemble each other as closely as peas in a pod, and like good respectable peas, they sustain life, but do not advance it. I determined that COMFORT should be a publication of, for and by the people; that it should demolish the barriers of cold type that are so laboriously reared by the average conventional editor between publisher and reader, and that it should make its appeal along broad, human lines, going straight to the heart as well as to the intellect, carrying at all times a message of hope, cheer, friendship, love and brotherhood into every home it entered, and especially the homes of the vast masses of the people whose needs are ignored and whose cry for enlightenment, sympathy and succor only too often meet with studied indifference from those whose one desire is to exploit them.

That COMFORT filled a great and crying need can be readily seen by the hearty welcome it receives in every home it enters, and the delight its pages afford to all those who peruse them. Before me lies a letter which tells the whole story in a nutshell, it reads thus: "I take a dozen magazines and papers, and though amongst this list are some of the best publications in the land, COMFORT is the favorite in our home, because it has a human touch, a vital something that makes it stand out from all the rest, radiating an atmosphere of love and good fellowship and causing its readers to regard those who are responsible for its creation as benefactors to society and dear, personal friends, as near and precious to us as are the members of our own family." Tens of thousands have written to us in this strain, and surely no man and no publication has existed in vain, that draws forth such an eloquent testimonial as this.

Every day it is brought home to us in a thousand different ways that humanity is starving for kindness and love. Few care about the masses of the people and few still understand their needs or have any honest desire to cater to them. COMFORT however, instead of viewing the plain people from the heights, suspiciously and indifferently, meets them on a common level, recognizing that we are all children of one Father, all interdependent and necessary to each other, all struggling for a place in the sun, and not until we meet our fellowman on his own level, clasp him by the hand and look into his honest eyes, can we expect to win his confidence or be worthy of his friendship, lighten his burdens and widen his opportunities.

We have ever striven to meet our readers on a democratic and fraternal basis, a plane of mutual self-interest, and the place that this publication holds in the hearts of its readers is proof indeed of the success of our efforts.

Nothing affords me greater satisfaction and pleasure than the knowledge that among COMFORT'S subscribers are both children and grandchildren of those who greeted this publication on its first appearance.

Thousands of our readers delight in informing us that one of the most cherished memories of childhood, when they were lisping tots, was the monthly appearance of COMFORT. Mother read its contents aloud to them as they gathered around her, just as thousands of mothers in every section of our land are doing today.

The impressions of childhood are lasting, and the influence for good that COMFORT has wielded on the youth of the nation (filling plastic brains with the precious seeds of truth, honor and righteousness, upbuilding character, developing the moral and the spiritual, ever pointing the way that leads to perfect manhood or womanhood and the lofty heights of ideal citizenship) has been incalculable.

Millions of American citizens, both men and women, have grown up under COMFORT'S guiding influence, and every unit of our great army of readers has been a center from which has radiated the COMFORT message of love and brotherhood, the COMFORT ideals of truth, justice and mercy. The good that has thus been accomplished by our ever widening circle of readers is beyond the power of the human mind to compute. Certainly no publication in the land has so deeply influenced the national character for good, nor imbued so vast a number of people with the simple and homely virtues that are the proudest possessions of our race.

In fighting the battles of the plain people, COMFORT is ever in the lead and among the reform measures for which it has consistently fought, or is still strenuously fighting, are such public benefits as the parcel post, the election of U. S. senators by direct vote of the people, the postal savings bank, the initiative, referendum and recall, direct primaries, the exclusion of undesirable aliens, farm credits, proper observance of the Lord's Day, the abolition of the saloon and the uprooting of the drink evil, compulsory education, abolition of child labor, the suppression of white slavery, a tax upon incomes, an adequate navy for the protection of our coasts, etc.

COMFORT is not only on the firing line of progress but it is its policy to lead and direct the advancing hosts of democracy, and by keeping well to the front, it helps to blaze the way for its mighty army of readers who rely on it to be a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, ever pointing to the path that leads to the shining goal of human happiness.

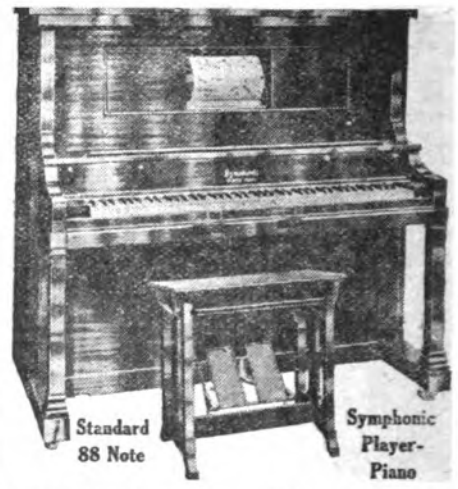
To the sick and suffering COMFORT has endeavored to be a ministering angel, heartening, cheering and aiding the weary and downcast and ever binding up the wounds of those who have fallen by the wayside in the battle of life.

COMFORT'S principles are known of all men, and it has unflinchingly stood in the breach when leading its embattled hosts against the entrenched foes of monopoly, privilege and graft.

COMFORT has no political bias, it is radically conservative and conservatively radical, upholding whatever may be good and vigorously opposing all that it considers inimical to the interests of its readers, and the public generally, declining to be the tool of any party, or to promote any fad, preferring to forge ahead in its own way, knowing from long experience how to avoid these rocks and quicksands which so often wreck the fairest plans of the most intrepid crusader.

COMFORT has accomplished much, and by the grace of God and the help of its friends, it will accomplish more.

In the work COMFORT is doing I plead, and I am confident not in vain, for the friendly help and assistance of the great army of our subscribers. I want to extend the sphere of COMFORT'S influence and increase its usefulness a hundredfold. The need of your support grows more and more pressing. The enemies of the masses, who are the enemies of society, grow daily more arrogant, and you must hold up our hands and give us your enthusiastic support in our endeavor to combat them.



To build up the hopes of men, to banish poverty and want, crime and disease, to make strong, healthy, God-loving men and women, to stand between oppressor and oppressed, to engage in the ennobling work of human uplift and physical and material betterment, to place the American home four-square to the winds of heaven, upon a foundation of enduring prosperity and happiness, this is COMFORT'S mission. To this exalted purpose COMFORT is dedicated and its able staff of editors and contributors will, with your valuable assistance continue their inspiring work until its aim is achieved.

No publication on earth gives so much and asks so little in return as does COMFORT. Our millions of readers heartily bear witness to the fact that it grows better with every issue, and it will continue to grow better as the months roll on. We are giving more for the subscription price than any other publication has ever attempted, and I feel confident that you my friends, who have stood loyally by us in the past, and you too who have but recently enlisted under COMFORT'S banner, will spread amongst your neighbors the glad tidings of its appealing message, and so help the good work along by bringing millions more under the benign and uplifting influence of a publication whose destinies I have the privilege and honor to assist in shaping.

Thanking you most heartily for all the favors you have showered upon myself and COMFORT'S staff in the past, and trusting you will in the future with redoubled zeal, aid us in increasing and broadening the sphere of COMFORT'S influence, I am,

Your sincere friend,

W. H. GANNETT.

"I Have Been Lonely for Music"

A customer in recently ordering her Symphonic Player-Piano gave that as her reason for selecting this instrument in preference to a piano. She told us that her daughter, a good pianist, had moved away taking her piano with her. As a result the home that once resounded with music, became a lonesome place to live in. The Symphonic will chase loneliness from your home just as it did from this home. Your home will then be a happy, joyous place. You may then play the world's best Popular, Patriotic, Sacred and Classical music without tedious practice.

eggs, and you want to sell them to private families, instead of disposing of them to the storekeeper or that arch thief of commerce, the middleman. Isn't it strange that a Tennessee egg grower should be writing to an invalid in New York asking him how to find a market for his egg produce? Well I can tell the Tennessee man, and I can tell you all how to find a market for your goods. If you have a good thing to sell the only way to sell it, is to let the public know you've got it, and the way to let the public know you've got a thing, is to advertise and keep on advertising. If that doesn't bring you customers nothing will. If your local papers don't reach all the people that want eggs, have a circular printed and mail them to all the likely egg buyers within twenty miles. Get special containers and ship the eggs by parcel post. The postal authorities are doing all in their power to encourage and foster this particular line of business, so as to reduce the cost of living in the city. Newspaper advertising is always better than circularizing and much cheaper. All the things you see in the grocery store and ask for over the counter, have been made familiar to you by advertising, which is the live wire of trade. Try the local papers, and if you don't succeed make a house-to-house canvass for miles around with your dairy products. If the things I've suggested don't get results, nothing will. What a pity people do not know the value of advertising. Always run your eye over the advertising columns.

HOLT, FLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live in Santa Rosa Co., thirty-nine miles east from Pensacola, on the P. & A. Division of the L. & N. R. R.

I would write a brief description of my state, but it would make my letter too long, and take up space which others could use to better advantage. I love music, flowers, birds, girls and everything that is good and beautiful. I love to study Nature in all her beauty.

Pardon me Uncle, but I notice that you don't print as many of the cousins' letters as you have before. If your health does not permit it, I have no more to say about it. I certainly enjoy your talks to us, and try to bring them to bear upon and strengthen other resolutions that I make.

Cousins, what good do we get from reading and studying, if we fail to put it into practise?

Uncle, if you would spend next winter in Florida's superb, snowless climate, I believe you could walk back to Maine. I will be glad to hear from any of the cousins, especially the girls. As I have no parents COMFORT is my comfort now. I try to practise its teachings. "Uncle Charlie's Poems," will knock the "blues" higher than a kite. Get a copy all you cousins. Best wishes for COMFORT, Uncle Charlie, and all the cousins. Hoping to see this in print, I am as ever, Your friend,

CLEVELAND WHITE. (League No. 38,898.)

Grover, I mean Cleveland, there is one little sentence in your letter that mightily appeals to me, it is this, "What good do we get from reading and studying if we fail to put into practise what we learn!" My! what sermons could be preached on that little text. The world today doesn't get much education and what it does learn it doesn't apply as a rule to any worthy purpose. You all know the Lord's prayer or at least half of you do. Now the very biggest men in this country (financially and not morally big I mean) you will find in church on Sunday. Most of them are after their fashion what are called very sincere Christians. They pray long and earnestly and they give liberally to charitable causes. They know all about the teachings of Christ, but they would drop dead if you asked them to apply those teachings, and make them their standard of conduct in their dealings with their fellow men. In the Lord's prayer, to take a concrete example, it says: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth" and later it says: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Twice a day wealthy and powerful gentlemen repeat that glorious prayer and make these appeals to the Divine Power above. Mr. Rockefeller, hundreds of his class, thousands of ministers, and millions of ordinary human beings, were taught that prayer at their mother's knee and have repeated it daily and will continue to repeat it all their lives, and yet from Mr. Rockefeller down to the humblest mortal, not one wants Christ's kingdom on earth, and mighty few are willing to forgive a trespass that is made against them—if you can judge by their acts. If you trespass against a man, instead of forgiving you, he calls a Cop or brings a suit for damages in the courts. I remember having some fun of an innocent nature with a minister once, the trespass was so slight that he could have easily have forgiven me, as I apologized very humbly, but though I was under that minister's nose for four years and heard him preach on the beauties of forgiveness several times, and heard him with quivering voice and upturned eyes repeat the Lord's prayer hundreds of times, he was relentless to the end. That shows how much he put his teachings into practise. When you analyze the lives of public men whether in the business world, in the courts, in our law-making assemblies, in our pulpits, you will find that very few make any real effort to put in practise those things which they so glibly preach to the multitudes. Life becomes purely mechanical with the majority of people. The ministers who are conscientiously trying to bring the kingdom of God on earth, you could almost count on the fingers of one hand, and the fat man with the steel mills and oil wells in the front pew, if he thought the kingdom of God was coming in answer to his appeal, would simply drop dead. While he mechanically says the Lord's prayer with agitated lips, his mind is figuring out how much money he is going to make on the next bunch of watered stock. The man of millions shies at the thought of the kingdom of heaven, for he has a very comfortable heaven already, every creature comfort that his heart can crave, and power to command the services of thousands of men and the ability to exploit them to his heart's content, and to dominate their courts and legislatures. The kingdom of heaven would mean justice and brotherhood, and though the big man revels in charity, which is a curse to those who give and those who take, directly you mention the word justice, his doctor will send a certificate that if he speaks one word he'll choke, and a steam yacht carries him to a convenient tropical island, where courts and process servers cease from worrying, and billionaires are at rest. The kingdom of Heaven however is within us, it is just a precious seed, sown by God's own hand. In some hearts the soil is so stony that it never develops and never influences for good the lives of those whose precious possession it is. That seed is capable of enormous development and the thing that would develop it most is to bring up man in an environment that is conducive to manliness and godliness. An environment that will make him a creature of light instead of a demon of darkness, an environment that will make him man's brother instead of his exploiter, a seeker after truth instead of a grubber after tainted dollars. The reason so few of us apply the worthy things we learn, and make Christ's teachings a part of our every-day living is due to the fact that the world is built and run in such a way that it produces the worst in men instead of the best. The Christ ideal is service, man's ideal is profits. Christ's ideal produces love, virtue, mercy and brotherhood, man's ideal greed, lust, crime and sin. Now Cleveland, though it's mighty hard to apply noble teachings and live up to high ideals without hurting your pocketbook, incurring hatred, suffering persecution, it can be done, and the greater the opposition the more glorious the victory. You may not have the money that the other fellow has who took the easier way, but you will have the glorious satisfaction of knowing, even as I know, that you have put some mighty big nails in the coffin of wrong and greed, and that because of your example hundreds of other men have seen the light and are rushing with the hammer of service and the nail of determination to help you in the glorious task of boxing and burying the twin monsters, that have enslaved mankind from the dawn of the race. Every nail in the coffin of wrong makes the world an easier place for others to live and develop in and brings the kingdom of heaven nearer to hand. The day when that little seed of love and goodness automatically sprouts in the hearts of man, the dream of the centuries will be realized.

NEBR.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have read with interest your letters of advice to old and young, and want you to advise me. I am a married woman of twenty-nine years, have been married ten years and have two little girls and the kindest husband, I believe that ever lived. But Uncle I am far from being contented. The place where we live is very thinly settled, twenty miles from a railroad, and the people are most of them old timers, very ignorant and narrow minded. I won't say all the people out here, but mostly the ones in our neighborhood, the ones I have to associate with. I have lived here all my life, and perhaps you will think I ought to like it, because I know nothing different. I have never been out of the county, more than three or four times in my whole life, and I am just hungry to see something of life, to see different people, to be with someone that knows something. We are well to do and I have everything that money can buy to make me happy. My husband is very contented, because he is making money and I don't believe there is a better place to make it than right here. But of what use is anyone's money if they must live in such a place? I don't like to complain, for my husband tries so hard to make me happy. It would be different if I could get away from here once a month or so, for then I could settle down more contentedly. But it is the same thing day in and day out. Sometimes I think I am going crazy. Do you think I am wicked to be so discontented? Do you think it is right to bring up my children where they can never see anything, where there are no amusements and no place to go to for a change, and thus never know how to act when among people that do know something? Please advise me Uncle as I want to do what is right.

Your constant reader, MRS. H. F.

Dear Friend: I get many a letter like yours and I can thoroughly appreciate and understand just how you feel. In these hard times millions would be willing to change places with you, in fact I would myself if only to be relieved of one thing of which you are happily spared and that is the dread of the future. The daily battle for bread not only for one's self but for those in one's employ and the inevitable poor relations, for though there is plenty to go around in this world, things are not properly distributed and as a result, society, to its own undoing, is divided up into two classes, the haves and the have nots. Those who have too much, and those who have too little; and the hard, soul-crushing struggle of those who have too little wrinkles the brow, hardens the heart, and makes life hardly worth the living. The have nots, dear friend, will have little patience with you, railing against a condition which might not be a real hardship to them, but is a real hardship for you. I have felt very much as you have felt and not in a little town either. I know that yearning to be with someone who knows something, somebody who is congenial, someone who has ideals and aspirations, and at whose feet you can sit and learn, and dream great dreams. A depressing environment is a soul-crushing, dreadful thing, and to be marooned in some little jumping-off place where people are hopelessly dull and stupid is a torture to one who craves the companionship of intellectual people. Now if all the people around you were intellectual your life would never be a lonely one. Poverty of pocket generally means poverty of brain. Your neighbors, no doubt at times have a yearning for a broader life, a better knowledge of the world beyond, a yearning for art, music, and companionship, a craving and desire for the beautiful. The struggle for existence was too keen, and the radiant tints of their day dreaming were soon swallowed up however in the gray drab hues of plodding toil. You, my friend, have been more fortunate. The economic urge has not hobbled your imagination nor quenched the yearning of your soul for the ideal and beautiful, the inspiring and grand. Most men find a keen enjoyment in money making, fun and pleasure in the mere accumulation of dirty green slips of paper. This instinct is deeply rooted in "human" nature but until we can replace it with something better, something nobler, something more inspiring, we shall have to tolerate it though despising it. There is not much in life for the woman whose husband is a cash register. The fact that the human cash register is ready to surround his wife with every comfort does not make her life very much more endurable. Man being largely material fails to comprehend that there are things a woman craves that clothes, food and shelter cannot satisfy. A home may satisfy some women, but thank God, not all. The soul does not feed on bricks and mortar, clapboards and cook stoves. There is a hunger of the heart and the soul and brain, an intellectual and spiritual hunger, that intensely real as it is few men fail to recognise. The brain reels and gets dizzy doing the same thing day in and day out. There is nothing like a change of scene and environment, of new faces and new ideas to brighten one up, and refresh the jaded housewife, for the best home in the world can take on the aspects of a prison if we are tied to it eternally without relaxation and change. The monotony of the country side is a problem that is very real and one we are gradually solving. The writer of this letter sadly needs a change. A month in our big Eastern cities would be a Godsend to her. The change would make her more contented with her present environment and meeting with strange people would soon make her realize that the home folks had a lot of good qualities she had never discovered before, and though perhaps they were not very bright, they were at least tremendously kind and good hearted. She would also realize that people are stupid because their opportunities for acquiring knowledge and culture (which will soon be the common heritage of all) have been exceedingly limited. I would advise you friend to lay in a stock of really good books. Good books give us a chance to get acquainted with the greatest men that ever lived. No one can be lonesome who has plenty of good reading matter. Books that teach as well as entertain, books that get the mind working in the right direction, and make life an intellectual and spiritual growth (and good books will do that in the most depressing environment) are what is needed. Try and give your neighbors a helping hand. Start a social center and see how readily people will acquire knowledge if given the opportunity. Get acquainted with a few shut-ins and invalids and correspond with them and as you brighten their lives of suffering you will brighten your own, for our own troubles are really very insignificant when we compare them with the dreadful lives so many thousands have to live. Healthy discontent is the spur of progress, but be sure your discontent is healthy or don't indulge in it, for life is largely what we make it, and after we've ransacked the world for pleasure, and enjoyment we generally find that home is the best place after all.

JAMESTOWN, N. DAK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have read COMFORT for nine years and nothing has interested me more than your fearless attack on all existing evils and your noble and unselfish life. I often wonder why men who are enjoying health and strength cannot or will not enlist in the good work which you are doing.

I have read with interest of the work you are carrying on for the Sunshine Club.

I am twenty-one years old, have been a country school teacher for two years and am now working my way through college. It is not easy but the advantages gained by a thorough education more than repay us for a few inconveniences. I wish most heartily I had power through speech and pen, to persuade parents to send children to school regularly and when through with grammar school to send them to high school and college. (It takes money to do that.—Uncle Charlie.) Even a farm laborer is better for a good education. In conclusion I would like to ask you for your autograph.

Again wishing you all health, happiness and success.

Your loving niece, LULU GERINGER.

Lulu, so you wonder why it is men who are enjoying health and strength will not put up a stiff fight as I have done, against the evils of the

"It"

"DID you ever play 'It'?" Cousin Emily turned to the discontented twins who were fretfully tapping the window pane and watching the rain.

"No," exclaimed Helen; "that must be a new game. Tell us about it, won't you, Cousin Emily?"

Marion was sent to the dining-room to call Tom and two other boys who were spending the afternoon with him, and when they came in, Cousin Emily said:

"It is lots more fun to play 'It' when there is a larger number of players; but I guess we can get along very nicely with just us six. Now, Tom, you and Marion go out into the hall and stay until we call you."

When the door was closed, big Cousin explained:

"Now, 'It' is your right-hand neighbor and Tom and Marion will try to find out what it is by asking questions that can be answered by either 'yes' or 'no.' Remember, your right-hand neighbor!"

"Aren't you folks ready?" asked Tom, through the keyhole.

"Oh, you heard!" exclaimed Helen as she threw open the door.

"No, I didn't, Helen, honest!" said Tom. "We didn't hear a thing, so thought you must be ready."

"Well, as it happens, we are," said Cousin Emily. "'It' is something in this room and you are to find out what it is by asking questions that can be answered by either 'yes' or 'no.' First Marion can ask one, then Tom, and so on. I would suggest, however, that you ask the same question of all of us until each one has answered in his own way, every question that has been put to the others."

"All right," said Marion. "Jay, is 'it' the clock?"

"No," said Jay and each of the others in turn. Various objects in the room were spoken of but all agreed that 'it' was none of them.

Finally Tom asked Helen, who was sitting to the left of Jay:

"Is it a girl?"

"No," said Helen.

"Is it a girl, Jay?" asked Marion.

Jay doubled up in his laughter as he replied: "Yes, sir; it's a girl!"

"Why, Helen, you said it wasn't!" exclaimed Marion in indignation.

All but Tom and Marion laughed until the tears streamed down their faces as they looked at the two perplexed ones who were looking for 'It.'

"Never mind," laughed Cousin Emily; "go on, Tom. It is your turn."

"I'm not going to play!" declared Tom. "If you are going to tell fibs about it, how can we know who is telling the truth and who is not?"

And Jay and Helen went into paroxisms of laughter again when Cousin Emily replied:

"No one has told you anything but the truth yet."

After a while, when a number of questions had gone around the group, Tom called out:

"I've got it! I know what 'it' is!"

"Tell me, Tom," said Marion.

"No, sir; you go ahead and find out! Say, that's a daisy one on us, isn't it?"

"What is it, Tom; what do you think 'It' is?" asked Cousin Emily.

Tom whispered something and Cousin Emily laughed. "Yes," she nodded to Jay and Helen, "he has guessed it. Now, Marion, go on; you will soon find out. Tom, you can be in the circle, now. Sit between Helen and me—perhaps that will help Marion a little."

For each play some new object has to be selected for "It."

For a long time, "It" has been the favorite game among these children and has been played to the infinite amusement of everybody whenever some one, ignorant of what "It" may be, has appeared in the family circle.

Try This

CAN you light the gas with the tip of your finger?

This is not a trick. I have done it and others have done it.

Follow these simple directions and you can do it, provided there is a room in your home with a carpeted floor.

Start at any part of the room, walk rather rapidly back and forth, keeping the feet on the floor. In other words, do not lift the feet, as in ordinary walking, but walk along scuffing the feet, so to speak. While mother will not approve this manner of navigation, she perhaps will permit it long enough to demonstrate the interesting phenomenon.

Some one must be stationed beside the gas-jet. After you have walked a number of times about the room, approach the gas-jet, this is turned on ready for you. Immediately lift your finger and touch the tip, and presto, it is lighted by the little electric spark which will jump from your finger as a discharge of the electricity you generate by the scuffing on the wool carpet. However, if you touch any other object, ever so light, before you touch the gas-tip, your power will be spent and failure will result. The main essential is to touch the tip at once after shuffling the feet. This experiment will be successful only in cold, dry weather such as makes your hair crackle when brushed dry.

Should you suddenly touch the brow of a person present, instead of the gas-tip, you would hear a decided snap, and very likely a little cry of dismay.

Silhouettes

ON one side of a darkened room, quite near the wall, place a small table, bearing a lighted candle. Leave sufficient space between table and wall to seat one person. Over the table on the wall, pin a good-sized sheet of plain white paper.

One by one, call in the guests. Seat them at the table, next the wall. The lighted candle will cause the black shadow of their silhouette to be thrown upon the sheet of paper. Now with a soft pencil outline the profile of each guest, dismissing each to make room for the next.

After the profiles of all have been secured, carefully cut them out from the paper, keeping close to the pencil marks.

The company is now assembled. Each is given slips of paper and a pencil.

The silhouettes, all plainly numbered, are pinned to some dark background, in sight of the assemblage, and all try their best to guess to whom each profile belongs, writing the name of the person opposite the corresponding number.

Prizes are given to those who have the largest number of correct answers.

The Farmer's Wife of Today

—Her Advantages Against Her Limitations

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

By Adele Steiner Burleson

THE magic twentieth century today, rolls the sum of advantages of the farmer's wife far above and beyond her limitations. Our yesterday—a generation or so ago, the farmer's wife was represented by one type only and in our mind's eye she was the human exponent of the hardest, most unremitting toil. Minus all labor-lightening devices and time-saving conveniences, her world was a round of work never done, but now—unless by her own voluntary decree, she is like her husband, the most thoroughly independent, all-around comfortably situated individual in the world.

Whom do we mean when we speak of the farmer's wife? The term is subject to much classification, division and subdivision, for there are as many different kinds of farmers' wives as there are different kinds of farmers. But I doubt not we all have the same definitely outlined figure in mind when we speak generally, not specifically of the farmer's wife. She stands serenely in her domain, by common consent living in a small house, in the midst of fields and pastures, more or less distantly removed from the centers of trade and the rush of metropolitan life.

Does she gain or lose through this detachment from the city?

The spirit of the age demands the fullest development for each individual. Under the conditions of her life is this possible for the farmer's wife?

Credited with all of the primitive virtues, she makes a good start, according to public estimation, towards working out her own good. But to her admitted good qualities, she must add the power of developing her especial tastes and talents before it can be conceded that she has done the best for herself and consequently those about her.

To what extent is she handicapped in an effort to secure the recognized best things of this life?

Beginning with our physical needs we come first to pure air; something the farmer's wife always possesses in such unstinted quantity that she is probably slow to recognize it as a blessing. Perhaps only the urbanite, in his constant struggle against contamination by the smoke and germ-laden dust in the air he breathes, can fully appreciate what she takes for granted. Good air means good lungs and good health, both of which are necessary for good spirits.

Pure food ranks high among the things considered essential to health and life. In the city it is procured only by the enactment of numerous laws and their enforcement by an army of inspectors. Their non-enforcement and dishonesty sometimes make it unattainable. Their very purity frequently places upon meats, chickens and eggs, a price prohibitive to the housewife with but moderate means at her command. For neither the wholesaler, nor the retailer is disposed to suffer the loss occasioned through the condemnation of quantities of tainted food. The loss occasioned thereby with cold storage charges in addition are passed on to the consumer, often making first-class meats and poultry a luxury in many households.

Go to the country! There you find smokehouses stored with hams, bacon, lard and that priceless product, pure, wholesome country sausage. The poultry-yard is noisy with its broods of turkeys, chickens, ducks and frequently guineas and geese. In the pastures may be seen cattle and the flock of sheep. Here is an abundant meat supply at hand, most of it ready for use and all without menace from impurities. It is an improvident farmer's wife whose table goes unsupplied with those things which too often in the city are counted expensive luxuries.

In the matter of vegetables, the city markets might appear to have the advantage over the garden patch in the country, for in them may be found the first fruits of many climates. The delights of melons in mid-winter and strawberries in January, however, are more apparent than real. They may prove satisfactory to the grower and retailer as a source of profit, but to the real lover of the luscious fruits and berries, familiar with their true sundeveloped flavor, they are but poor substitutes. Picked green, shipped long distances and high priced the mid-winter vegetables are beyond the reach of the many. Even during the summer season, when they may be had fresh and ripe, the prices continue high enough to be a drain on a limited income.

In the country, on the other hand, with a small outlay of labor and almost nominal cost, the farmer's wife can command the fresh, naturally ripened dewy products of an early spring, and summer and late autumn garden. Add to the material advantages of such a garden, the pleasure of making it or superintending it, and in addition, the culture acquired from a knowledge of the growth and habits of plants, and we find the country woman far in advance of her city sister, who orders her vegetables by telephone or selects them from a market stall.

Even drought, once the frequent wrecker and constant menace of the country garden, need no longer be feared, for since the coming of the windmill, the gasoline and kerosene engines irrigation on a small scale is always feasible, and its absence where it is needed, is but an indication of thriftlessness.

Pure water, like pure air, is another natural heritage of the dweller in the country. It is to be had on almost any farm. By a little digging and only a superficial knowledge of drainage, a well of the purest water may be secured. With more expenditure of time and labor artesian water is within reach. Or, the farm may possess that great blessing, a spring of subterranean birth. Nature supplies these waters pure and it would require unusual carelessness and ignorance on the part of the owner to pollute them. Safe from contamination through other people's drains and unlimited by meters, the farmer, by a simple system of piping can make the farm's water supply a source of comfort to his family.

Aside from its practical value, the presence of a river or brook within the farm's limits adds greatly to the æsthetic enjoyment of the owner. Who has not experienced the allurements of a small stream? A harborer of sun perch, a producer of the delicate water cress. A smiling addition to the landscape, a companion for every mood, it should be and doubtless is an unfailing source of pleasure to the women into whose daily life it enters.

It is a common complaint among city people that they are practically cut off from the big phenomena of nature. Some of them from the vantage ground of high windows possess a view. A view is pleasing—sometimes inspiring, but who would not substitute for it the intimate associations of a leafy hollow in the woods, of the fellowship of a breezy hillside?

In the city there is no watching for day across wide stretches of verdant field and pasture, no waiting for the unsurpassed glory of a sunset or of moonrise, above the thicket's dark line. Such joys as these are ever at hand to the farmer's wife.

Quiet—Of inestimable value is the quiet of the country. To be undistracted by the noises of trolley cars, automobiles, horns, bells, factory whistles, the roar and rumble of railroad traffic and street criers, is an advantage apparent to every one. But not everyone realizes the importance of quiet to the nervous system.

Many of our public office holders and most successful business men owe their steady nerves and good constitutions to the dreamless sleep of boyhood days on the farm.

The remote whistle of a locomotive, or the call of a night bird, breaks the silence perhaps but not the peaceful quiet of the country.

Hurry—Of equal benefit to the development of a satisfactory system is the absence of strain in country life. Work and plenty of it is to be done on the farm, but there appears to be enough time in which to accomplish it. The day is regulated by "sun-up," noon and afternoon. In the city, time is reckoned by hours and minutes. The wife must have the breakfast ready at a fixed hour, that the husband may make his street car at a particular time in order to arrive at his place of business to keep an engagement at a certain moment.

Hurry seems to be an inevitable law of city life that sooner or later drives its victims to the country for the relief which quiet brings to the tortured nerves.

Illness rarely takes the rural woman to the city; on the contrary, while there, she draws on her splendid reserve of energy acquired through long quiet days free from strain. Pressure is a great producer, but the doubtful quality of work done under whip and spur and the penalty paid for it in overtaxed nerves, at least negatives its value. A moderate industry, backed by the desire to do and plenty of time, will accomplish something more nearly of an expression of your real self, than is the case when necessity is forcing you to finish one piece of work, no matter how, because other things are crowding upon you.

Dress—The advantages of simplicity in dress is recognized by the farmer's wife and serves to illustrate the tyranny of fashion, for in town few women are willing to ignore the conventions in the matter of dress. In a large circle the spirit of rivalry and emulation, prompts women to make their clothes an item of large expenditure and frequent extravagance leading to the betrayal of their husband's interests. When her circle includes only the members of her family her appeal to them is made through her housewifely qualities and sweetness of character. No artificial adornment of her person is needed with which to secure their attention, their admiration, or their appreciation of her worth. Nearly every woman in the world is a natural dress reformer but it is only in the sympathetic atmosphere of her own home and where that home is practically protected from outside invasion that she carries out her theories and consigns to everlasting limbo, the high heels, corsets, hobble skirts and other unintelligent developments of urban civilization.

Proper out-of-doors exercise and recreation are problems in city life not always easily solved. There are but few occupations in the city that offer the out-of-doors exercise necessary to keep one in proper physical condition for the best work. To secure such exercise one must either walk, play tennis or golf, ride horseback or go in for bathing athletics. Most of these things require either more time or larger means than are usually at the disposal of the majority of people. Whereas in the country there is never any lack of space for tennis courts, rent free, with no club dues attached; and a farm without at least one saddle or driving horse, safe for use by the farmer's wife and the children, would hardly deserve to be called a farm.

The riding habit the country woman wears may not be of the latest fashionable cut, nor the mount groomed to a satin finish; and following the traditions of her family she may even use a side-saddle instead of riding astride and her way will be across pastures and fields instead of along the bridle paths of a fashionable park, but the splendid exhilaration of the healthful and delightful exercise will be equally as great while the expense involved is almost nothing.

The woman who interests herself in poultry or live stock, provides for herself many hours in the open that her city sister greatly envies her. Health and information follow the mere routine of her duties as it does most occupations in the country. Entertained and instructed in a perfectly natural way, which is the best way by her own pursuits throughout the day, there remains for her the quiet evening hour with a good magazine or book whereby she gets news of the rest of the world. And if she will only keep in mind the fact that no other world is any more worth while than her own, no life necessarily richer or fuller than hers, she can add happiness and contentment to the other good things inherent to country life.

Of all the slanderous charges against life in the country that of monotony is the worst. It must have originated with the person to whom the evening star is a poor exchange for electric street lights, who finds his greatest happiness in cafe music and the moving picture shows. To this type of person it is useless to urge the advantages of the country. He would go anywhere or do anything to avoid thought or reflection and he finds this easiest amid the noise, the flashing lights, the amusements of a big city.

Where does a man or a woman go, when he or she wants to write a book, a play, a lecture or a speech or any kind of a message to the world into which he or she plans to put the best thought, and energy, the sum of personal experience? Why, they go to the country of course. To the place where they can be free from interruption, away from the frequently idle and unnecessary as well as the inevitable distractions of the city.

In view of the immense public libraries now a modern feature of all large cities, it would seem that books are most accessible to the urbanite, but when you consider that modern fiction is the character of the book doing the most of the circulating and then count the cost in time of registering and returning each book, the advantages of a circulating library do not appear to be so great. The difficulties in the matter of getting books make the farmer's wife more discriminating, perhaps as to those she acquires. But even if her reading be confined to a single metropolitan newspaper, one or two good magazines and the bulletins issued by learned men, through the great Department of Agriculture, she possesses everything requisite to self culture. To secure these bulletins, she has but to write to her Congressman and ask that her own name or that of her husband, be placed on the list of those to whom the government publications are to be mailed. Within these pamphlets may be found the latest scientific conclusions of government experts on all subjects of interest to the farmer.

The time when these bulletins were held to contain only the impractical vaporings of theorists is long since past. Their conclusions have been demonstrated in the government laboratories and worked out along practical lines on government experiment farms and they now stand as the latest word on all agricultural matters. A study of these publications will oftentimes open a new world to the farmer's wife.

There are many lines of work and achievement possible to the rural woman that would be closed to her were her energies confined to the narrow limits of a town flat or a house with a yard sufficient only for a clothes line.

Among the primitive virtues still practiced in the country is that of real hospitality. The arriving guest is received with open arms. She is not met at the front door, after a disheartening wait, with the chilly statement from the hired girl that the mistress is "Not at home". All doors are open to her in the country. She shares the family duties, considering it a privilege to feed the chickens and help with the churning; also to inspect the latest registered calf and learn from the farmer himself the condition of the crops. From another sphere, bringing with her its atmosphere, its news, its cheer, she is always entertaining to her hosts. No theater parties or afternoon teas, involving effort and expense, must be planned for her. To drink a cup of milk fresh from the cow and buttermilk fresh from the churn, she considers her highest privileges.

Our æsthetic joys are increased through her participation in them. We become freshly alive to the beauties of nature. We point to the sunset with a feeling of ownership, almost as if we, ourselves had arranged the details. Of a particularly silvery moon, or an especially starry heaven we are pridefully proud, and are conscious of a generous pleasure in sharing them with her. Perhaps this power she has of bringing to the minds of her country friends a realization of their many blessings is the best of all the things she does for them.

In spite of the fact that every year the big cities are getting bigger, there is an increasing number of people who are learning that the persons living in the city are only those who cannot afford the privilege of living in the country. More and more men of means are providing country homes for themselves and their families. They want their children to grow up under natural conditions; to have all the glorious experiences with live things and growing things, to which childhood is entitled. And it is doubtful if a single farmer's wife can be found who is not fully alive to the tremendous advantages of the country for her children.

It is only when they reach the high school age that town begins to offer things the country is unable to supply. The big colleges are not a country product. The technical knowledge in the professions that wins a degree cannot be acquired on the farm. The boy or girl who wants to study law or medicine, civil engineering, electricity or architecture must leave the farm. It is at this period of life that the city makes its irresistible call to them. And during the years that follow, years of work, oftentimes hard, unremitting, competitive labor, the city holds them. But few among them ever forget the old farm. Through the busy years it beckons to them and when the fight for success has won they go back to it. And all during their stressful lives in the city, whenever they can escape for a few days, these children of the country flee to the fields with gun or fishrod or camera or perhaps just a walking stick and a knapsack.

Temperament unquestionably plays a large and important part in determining for a woman whether or not she can live in the country and still properly fulfill her destiny. She has no control over the environments to which she is born, but she can sometimes successfully combat them afterwards. The important question to be decided, of course, is whether or not they are favorable to her development and progress.

Ambition and industry are the levers that move the world, but not infrequently discontent masquerades as ambition and plays sorry tricks on those who listen to its voice.

To complain of one's surroundings is not infrequent. To feel one's self unappreciated, misunderstood or wasted intellectually and spiritually starved, is a situation that confronts most of us sometimes, and many of us all of the time. Nothing helps people so much as a healthy dissatisfaction with whatever is wrong, or immoral or unbeautiful in their lives. But to live with unseeing eyes, blind and insensible to the beauty in the duties closest to them, dreaming only of the things made unattainable by the limitations of their lives, wrecks more people than all other causes.

The country girl should be very certain that her cramped life, if such she considers it, is due to unsurmountable conditions in her home before she makes up her mind to leave it.

The country woman can commit no graver blunder than to influence her husband to abandon the old farm for an untried life in the city, if it is the glitter of life which attracts her. The advantages of the move should be thoroughly understood and carefully weighed, else the wife may find herself minus the happiness she had anticipated as well as without many, many material comforts whose loss she had not counted on.

Sometimes the change is made in the interest of the older children, whose studies take them to the laboratories and special schools of the big cities, but rather than such a general uprooting, would it not be better to throw the young people on their own responsibility in the city, sheltering them so far as may be possible, keeping the farm with its steadying influence for the times when they can come back to it. With the wonderful correspondence extension work done by the big universities, no one need leave home except for the yearly examinations at some nearby high school, to get an academic degree. This plan may lack much that is desirable and educational and enjoyable for the college student.

There is no campus in it, or fraternities, or college athletics, or warm friendships with classmates, who, in this case are like "ships that pass in the night." There is absent the stimulating effect of competing fellow students, the personality of the professor with his magnetic influence over the susceptible young heart and mind. On the other hand, it eliminates the sometimes prohibitive expense of sending a boy or girl away from home and makes possible to them in the only way a college education. It may save to the farm the young capable hands without which the crop could not be made. Also, it might protect the boy, during critical years from the idleness of social distractions and even permanent dissipation and bad habits.

There are some arts that may be pursued easily and happily in the country but if the farmer's wife or daughters wish to study painting, or sculpture, or music seriously, it will have to be admitted that they must, at least, be in touch with the city.

The painter takes his sketchbook and goes to the country for the summer, but his studio, his classes, his work are in town. To really study art, one should be surrounded by it, breathe its atmosphere, hear and talk its jargon; and be prepared to make the sacrifices it demands.

Music is not less exacting of its followers. It too, has a world of its own, and those who enter it close the door to many of the simple joys of life. Talent of the highest order alone justifies its pursuit and then only where conditions are favorable to its development, for a lifetime is none too long for its sincere cultivation. To its earnest devotees, it makes big returns, but to the country girl fretting for a musical training in the big city and knowing little of the cost either in money or time or effort, music is apt to prove a sad disappointment. The opera, its highest expression, does not enter into the daily life even of the city woman. It is a rare and costly treat, not always considered a possible experience to the thrifty housewife.

There is another feature of city life, from which women of the rural districts are more or less cut off, and that is the club. Of great significance to women has the club become. It exists in such variety of form as apparently to answer the need of every kind of movement, be that charitable, philanthropic, patriotic, æsthetic, political, civic or purely intellectual. So widespread has the organization of women become that it is doubtful if any woman, no matter how remote from urban activities or essentially rural her life may be, can altogether escape. But the farmer's wife, even though she be enrolled in one or more of these widespread associations, is not subjected to the strain of attendance, or of committee work, or the preparation of statistics or papers. She may lose, or feel that she loses through non-participation, but the compensation is there, as it is in most things. At least she avoids, besides the strain, the unpleasant personal jealousies and conflicts that only too frequently disturb the harmony of these societies. Neither is she burdened with dues, which in a surprising number of cases are a heavy tax upon the member's incomes. For not even the smallest wheels turn without the modern motive power—money.

One other essentially urban product, from which the farmer's wife is separated is the theater. Within the compass of this word are many things. It stands for the biggest artificial pleasure supplied by modern artificial life, although it has existed in its highest form since the early days of Greece. Its appeal is universal. Behind its doors may be found all things for all men. There they go for laughter or tears, intellectual enjoyment or light amusement and at all times thrills. But alas, for the quest of the theater patrons! no need to say "alas" if they get what they seek, but how often does that happen? The good play is on the stage but not on every stage, not even the majority of them. People enter the theater to be cheered or chastined, they come

Corn Silage for Horses

ANSWERING several inquiries we have to state that corn silage must be very carefully fed to horses. It is excellent as a part ration, if perfectly made and saved, but it is injurious if fed in excess or if the least bit moldy. A practical horseman of our acquaintance has well said that "moldy silage will kill a horse as sure as a shot gun." That is true. Horses are far more liable to injury from moldy feed than are cattle, swine or sheep. We have known of several instances where horses were killed by eating frosted and moldy silage thrown into the farmyard, as unfit feed for dairy cows. This feed caused cerebro-spinal meningitis, or forage poisoning. The trouble often is termed "staggers," or "blind staggers." The terrible loss of horses in Nebraska and Kansas a few years ago was due to molds in pasture grasses. Stabled horses did not succumb. Abortion in mares may be caused by any moldy feed, or by ergot in hay or grass; but it is about sure to happen if moldy silage is fed. Let silage be made from corn that is practically ripe. It is a great mistake to feed silage made of green corn. That becomes sour, or acid and has a wine odor. Acid silage is extremely irritating to the kidneys and anything that is irritating in that way is unfit feed for horses. Alfalfa hay has a like effect, if largely fed, or if the least bit moldy. It also is loosening to the bowels. It may be safe as a well-nigh exclusive ration for horses when made in a semi-arid state where the sun shines bright and hot every day and molds do not form. So with silage. It is safe feed if sound; unsafe feed if moldy or damaged in any way. Make silage a part ration for idle horses, growing colts, mares in the first stages of pregnancy, but not when well along in foal. It may also form a part of the ration of the idle stallion, but must not be fed during the breeding season. In all cases let silage be fed in conjunction with a larger quantity of first-class clover or mixed clover or Alfalfa hay. It is a good plan to run the hay through the cutter and mix it with the silage at feeding time. Fifteen pounds of silage is sufficient at any time, in conjunction with hay, for a draft horse. Lessen the amount if the kidneys or bowels are irritated by this feed.

Rational Feeding of Hay

A farmer has written us that his horse is not doing well, being "loggie" and dull, but ravenous in appetite. He adds that he is feeding this horse 55 pounds of hay, or thereabout, a day! No wonder the poor beast does not thrive. That much hay should feed four or five ordinary horses that are well fed on oats, bran and roots. The rule for feeding hay is to allow one to one and one quarter pounds for each hundred pounds of body weight. The lesser amount is given when the horse is at hard work. The amount of hay may be increased for an idle horse, with a corresponding reduction in oats. Hay in excess of what the horse actually needs and perfectly digests is wasted and detrimental. The rule for feeding grain is to allow one and one fifth to one and one third pounds for each hundred pounds of body weight of horse. The larger amount is fed to the hard worked horse. Wheat bran should form one ninth part of the concentrated feed, by weight, and the mixed feed should be dampened at meal time. Do not feed bran mashes once or twice a week. They commonly cause indigestion, or colic. Bright oat straw may well form a part of the roughage ration of the idle horse in winter and ear corn may take the place of some of the oats. A few pounds of good silage may safely be fed, but moldy hay is extremely dangerous feed for a horse. Avoid all moldy feed for horses. Such feed is the common cause of diabetes and may even prove poisonous, or cause cerebro-spinal meningitis, or "forage poisoning." Carrots are excellent winter feed and parsnips are almost as good. If Alfalfa hay is fed less oats and bran need be given. Allow the drinking water before feeding. See that each horse has some exercise every day. Idleness leads to disease.

Work Horse Rations

Work horses at the Wisconsin Experiment Station are fed a grain mixture of usually nine parts of oats and one part of bran by weight. They are given from four to seven quarts three times per day, the amount depending upon the size of the horse and the character of its work. In addition, two or four ears of corn are thrown in with the grain mixture. When a horse is thin and more flesh and better condition desired, as many as six ears of corn are given. On idle days the ration is cut down about one third in bulk and the grain mixture composed of seven parts of oats and three parts of bran and one half the amount of corn. From fourteen to eighteen pounds of hay, preferably good timothy, are given daily, about two thirds of which is given at night and the remainder in the morning. No hay is fed at noon. The horses are watered the first thing in the morning, just before leaving the stable, if not too warm, on entering the stable at noon, and again on coming into the stable at night. Salt is given to work horses once a week on Sunday.

Draft brood mares idle and doing only light work in winter are fed a mixture of four parts of oats and one part of bran. They are given four to six quarts twice a day, with corn stover at noon and from fifteen to eighteen pounds of hay per day, with free access to salt.

Draft foals are fed the first winter a ration composed of sixty-five pounds of crushed oats, ten pounds of cracked corn, ten pounds of bran, and fifteen pounds of cut Alfalfa or clover per one hundred pounds of mixed feed. It is thoroughly mixed and given either dry or slightly dampened. Thrifty draft foals will eat on the average about twelve pounds of this mixture per day, but very little hay or roughage in addition is required.

The Rat Nuisance

We want readers of this paper to give us their experience in ridding a farm of rats. In the long run are cats better than traps and poison as rat destroyers? If poison is used what should be employed, where and how? Is poisoning of rats liable to kill chickens and cats? It is common to see poultry picking at dead rats and mice and kittens do the same thing. The old cat may be too wise to eat a poisoned rat, but how about the kittens? We have seen as many as eighty rats killed at threshing time in one stack bottom. What a lot of grain these vermin must have consumed. It is not uncommon for the floor of a henhouse to be tunnelled in every direction by rats and what farm women has not had rats take the little chicks just when they are growing nicely and promising fine things for the future? One farm lady told us the other day that she had lost twenty-five incubator chickens in one night from rats. The dead chicks were piled in one heap and the neck or head of each showed a bloody place. Did rats kill those chicks, or was a weasel, mink or skunk to blame? Those who know are invited to tell us how much damage relatively is done to chickens by rats, skunks, weasels and mink. Some think that mink and skunk are of little damage. Most people believe that the rat is the worst offender, but possibly that is due to the fact that rats abound almost everywhere. Over in Scotland whole districts are banded together for the destruction of rats on farms. Money is assessed according to the acreage of each farm and professional rat catchers are employed. They are present at each threshing and work with trained rat dogs and ferrets, besides using traps. Poison is not so commonly employed. Rats apparently are increasing terribly in the states and are a far more serious pest than the English sparrow which has been called the "feathered rat." Let us have a postal card from you on the subject. Give only a statement of actual experience and in as few words as possible.

About Hog Cholera

The excessive feeding of new corn does not cause cholera; but it is a great mistake to stuff hogs on such feed. It surely weakens them and makes them more likely to contract cholera, or succumb to the disease if attacked. Cholera is due to a germ that has not been isolated and cultivated. It is termed a "filterable," or "ultra-microscopic" germ, being so small that it passes through a filter of porcelain and cannot be detected with the highest power microscope. The germs are carried in the air, in dust, in water and feed. Allowing hogs to drink from a creek is dangerous, as careless people often throw cholera carcases into such waters and the disease spreads to hogs drinking from it lower down the stream. Keep dogs and strangers off the farm, and especially pedlers selling alleged cholera cures or preventives. The disease cannot be prevented by medicine and is not curable by drugs. If the disease is right in the district have the hogs immunized by a graduate veterinarian of experience who will use fresh and reliable serum. For permanent immunization serum and virulent blood are injected at the same time. This is called the "Simultaneous" method or treatment. It should only be applied on exposed farms, where the disease has existed, or where hogs are to be kept immunized in the same way. Where the disease is present the well hogs should be immunized with serum alone and will be permanently immunized if they are exposed to the disease. Serum alone gives temporary immunity. It is a safe treatment, causing few if any deaths. The double treatment causes some losses. The best way to immunize hogs is to treat with serum alone and in a week give serum and virus. This costs more, but the results are most satisfactory. The sucking pigs of sows that have recovered from cholera are immune to a certain degree while nursing; but they have to be immunized when weaned, or when about fifty pounds in weight. If pigs are given the serum alone treatment it has to be repeated frequently to maintain immunity. Do not let any inexperienced person inject serum or virus. Virus should only be used by a graduate veterinarian and with the knowledge and consent of the state veterinarian, when the disease is on or very near the farm.

Winter Care of Milk

Many people believe that because the weather in winter is cool and there is less likelihood of milk's souring, milk needs no especial care. The contrary, however, is true. Milk needs better care in winter than it does in summer, strange as this may seem.

The reasons are these:

Cows Outdoors Much in Summer Produce Good Milk

Because the cows are outdoors much of the time in summer where the air is pure and fresh and are gotten up only to milk, there is little dust and dirt in the stable. These are usually cleaned early in the day, the doors left open and the bad air, odors and dust blow out or have time to settle during the day. If care is taken to brush off the flanks and udders at milking-time there is little danger of bad germs getting into the milk. The only other necessary precaution is to keep milk vessels absolutely clean in summer and cool the milk down rapidly as soon as drawn to as low a temperature as possible and then keep it cool.

Cows Confined in the Stable Much in Winter May Make Milk Bad

The cows are confined in the stables much in winter. The air becomes bad and laden with dust which gets into the milk at milking-time. Since little attention is paid to cooling, the bad germs rapidly spoil the milk. It is well to remember that spoiled milk is not necessarily sour milk. Milk may have a bad taste or odor and still be perfectly sweet.

Storing Milk in Stables a Bad Practise

Storing milk in the stable to keep it from freezing cannot be too strongly condemned. Milk absorbs odors very rapidly and is the best possible place for the breeding of bad germs. Under no conditions should it ever be stored in the stable but should be carried out of the barn as soon as possible after it is drawn from the cow.

For these reasons it will be seen that it is necessary to take more care in the handling of milk in winter than in summer.

A Few Good Rules for the Winter Care of Milk

1. Don't throw down hay, clean the stables, bed the cattle or otherwise stir up the dust immediately before milking time.
2. Always brush off dust, dirt and loose hair likely to fall into the pail from udders and flanks before beginning to milk.
3. Keep clothing, hands and milking utensils absolutely clean. Always scald all milk utensils every time they are used.
4. Never keep milk in the barn or stable.

Farm Cured Meats

There is no cured meat so palatable as that cured on the farm when the curing is properly done. There are several ways of putting up meat so that after curing it is almost the equal of fresh meat. Since these things should be more widely known COMFORT'S Modern Farmer is pleased to be able to give them to its million and a quarter subscribers.

A Good Pickle for Meats

The foundation of all cured meats is a good pickle for its preservation. Such a pickle is made as follows:

Eight pounds salt, two pounds sugar, two ounces saltpeter, water enough to dissolve the ingredients.

They should all be placed together in a large kettle, covered with water and boiled and stirred. Enough water should be added to thoroughly dissolve all the ingredients.

The above is sufficient for 100 pounds of meat. The meat should be packed in a large stone jar (or barrel) previously thoroughly cleaned with scalding water and then cooled. When perfectly cool, the pickle is poured over the meat. If insufficient to cover, water should be added. The meat may be held under the pickle by use of a brick which has been previously boiled. The important points are these:

1. The pickle must be boiled, then left to cool in the same receptacle in which it is cooked.
2. The meat must be cool.
3. The jar or barrel must be washed with boiling hot water.
4. The weights used must be boiled.
5. Everything must be perfectly cool when the meat is packed snugly and the pickle poured over.

How to Cure Hams

Use the pickle prepared as above. Leave hams in the pickle from four to six weeks, or until cured through. Remove, drain, and smoke for one or two days, using corn cobs or hickory wood. Hams cured in this way keep well into the summer if hung in a dry place.

How to Make Bacon

Use the pickle exactly the same as for hams. Leave the strips of side meat in the pickle two or three weeks, or until seasoned through. This can be told by cooking a sample. Remove, drain, smoke and store exactly the same as for hams.

How to Make Corn Beef

For corn beef less salt should be used, from five to seven pounds, depending on taste. This pickle serves as a brine in which the beef may be kept for several months. At the first indication of staleness the beef should be removed, rinsed in fresh water and drained. The pickle should be boiled, skimmed and cooled; the barrel or jar washed with boiling water and cooled and the whole repacked as in the beginning. It is better, however, to make a fresh pickle for the second packing.

How to Make Dried Beef

The strips of round steak or shoulder free from bone may be packed in the same pickle with the cornbeef. In from three to four weeks remove, drain and smoke exactly the same as for hams or bacon. Then hang up near the stove to dry. When properly cured, dried beef may be kept all summer and is very palatable.

How to Make Sausage

Use neck and flank pieces of beef free from bone and gristle. The shoulders of pork, the lean part of the jowl and some of the loin are excellent for pork sausage. A good mixture is one part of beef to two of pork. Grind together in sausage grinder. Season with salt, pepper and sage to suit taste, the heavier the seasoning the better the keeping qualities. Pack in cloth sacks or in jars that have been boiled and cooled. Cover jars by pouring over sausage a coating of lard. Paper sausage cases are now on the market. Sausage in bags or cases may be smoked if desired. Pork sausage may be made as above by omitting the beef and beef sausage by omitting the pork. Beef sausage is best smoked.

What It Costs to Make Pork

Farmers often ask: "Does it pay to feed sixty cent corn to make six cent pork?" or to put it in another way "Will a bushel of corn make ten pounds of pork."

This question has been extensively investigated by the experiment stations. In his study and research Henry found out three facts that should be thoroughly understood by every hog raiser:

First.—The older a pig becomes the less the gain per cent of live weight. The pigs gave one hundred pounds of gain after weaning for each 384 pounds of feed while it required 947 pounds of feed to produce 100 pounds of gain in the mother sows, or nearly three times as much. The pigs gained 7.4 per cent of their live weight each week, the sows but three per cent.

Second.—The older the pigs become the more feed it takes to make a pound of gain. Pigs averaging under fifty pounds each gave one pound of gain for each three pounds of feed—pigs weighing from 50 to 100 pounds required four pounds of feed to produce a pound of pork while pigs weighing over 200 pounds required five pounds of feed to make a pound of pork. Judging from these results, it seldom pays to feed pigs weighing over 250 pounds.

Third.—The longer the feeding period the more the feed required to make a pound of gain. For the first four weeks of feeding of a lot of pigs of about 200 pounds weight each, Henry found that it required only four pounds of feed to make a pound of gain while for the second four weeks, feeding of the same pigs, it required nearly five pounds of feed for a pound of gain and for the twelfth week of the feeding period it required six pounds of feed for one pound of gain. All these facts must be taken into account in finding the cost of producing pork.

Cheapest pork is produced by: 1. Feeding young pigs. 2. Fattening them as rapidly as possible. 3. And selling as soon as the pigs are fit and the market is right.

Do Winter Pigs Pay?

The question is often asked, "Does it pay to carry pigs over winter?" In the corn belt the farmers have learned that it seldom pays to have the pigs come in the fall and carry them over winter for the next season's pork. Cheapest and best pork is made from pigs from six to eight months old. By having the sows farrow in April the pigs can be made ready for market as early as the following October if kept growing from the start. A good breed of pigs should weigh at this age at least 200 pounds. Pigs dropped in November, fed and cared for all winter may perhaps be finished a month or so earlier but will be but little heavier at that time. The cost of keeping pigs during the winter months is much higher than in the spring, the danger of loss is greater, the cold weather prevents rapid gains and they are much more likely to become stunted in growth. The only advantage in winter pigs is having them ready to finish for the early market when prices are better. As a general rule, however, winter pigs do not pay.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

PREVENTING WEEVILS IN PEAS.—I have a lot of fine peas and I want a remedy to keep the weevils out of them. I want a remedy that will not be poisonous or injurious to people. W. G. D., Leesville, La.

A.—The peas should be exposed to the fumes of bisulphid of carbon in a tight room, for a large quantity of peas, or in a tight box for a small quantity. Let them remain a few hours; then they should be stored in metal containers, or strong paper bags. If it is found that weevils have already affected them they should be treated with the bisulphid at intervals until used. Be very careful about fire in handling this substance. It is as dangerous as gasoline, or more so, and the fumes of bisulphid of carbon are as explosive as the gas from gasoline; so keep fire, lamps and lanterns away from the place where the bisulphid is kept or used, and air the place out thoroughly when through with the operation.

FROSTED SILAGE AND FODDER.—In response to numerous inquiries about the effect of feeding frosted silage and fodder we give the following information and advice.

FROSTED SILAGE.—If the corn silage freezes to the sides of the silo do not allow it to remain there until a thaw occurs. Scrape it down every day and throw it into the center of the silo, after the silage for the day has been thrown down; then bury the frosted

Forecasts for the Coming Season

WHETHER of silk or cloth, checked, striped or plain, the new materials are used to bring out the lines of a chosen style.

Waists with raglan sleeves and yoke effects have the body portions of the model of contrasting material. Tunic and girdle skirts are similarly treated.

Flounces and ruffles in various depths are shown.

One sees high luster broadcloths, failes, whip-cords and new ripple woolens for street costumes and suits.

For dressy frocks, heavy charmeuse, faille silks and soft satins will be worn, in plain colors and stripes.

Silk braid or binding is much favored for tailored gowns, with buttons in military style, to match. Coats are taking on new and slender lines, with but a slight fitting at the waist, more width at the bottom, large collars, and flaring cuffs.

For children simplicity reigns. Styles for little folks produce comfortable garments, affording physical and mental freedom, and withal graceful and becoming.

Mother's dresses have tunics, so daughter's frocks are made with double skirts. This naturally raises the belt line. When belts are set low they are quite wide.

Capes for school are worn this year, and are so convenient and pleasing, especially when prettily lined.

A Thorn Among Roses

He had only recently returned, and, as yet, had had no opportunity to see her, although he had planned to call at Beechcote on the very evening of his cousins' unexpected arrival, since when he had, of course, been obliged to devote himself to their entertainment.

Sir Arthur, his father, was a pale, intellectual-looking man of nearly fifty years, and, although he was now in better health than he had enjoyed for years, he showed that he had been a great sufferer in the past.

"Did I understand my son to say that your name is Marchmont?" the gentleman inquired of Will, as he approached him, after the introductions were over.

"Yes, sir—my name is William Marchmont."

"Ah!" the word escaped Sir Arthur involuntarily, and with a slight start, which he hastened to cover by remarking, while he earnestly studied the young man's face: "You are an American, are you not?"

"Yes, sir; I was born in America, but I have lived in Europe with my guardian, Mr. Fletcher, during most of my life," Will replied, and flushing at his companion's question, for the subject of his nativity was a delicate one to him.

"Your guardian—then—ahem! Your parents are not living?"

"No, sir; but, pardon me, Judge Ashburton is beckoning me to go and help him with the fishing tackle. I will see you again later."

He bowed courteously and hurried away, while Sir Arthur Stamford's face grew suddenly set and grave.

"William Marchmont," he whispered, with pale lips. "Can it be possible—after all these years?"

He fell to musing where he stood, but he was not left long to himself, for his friends called to him that they were ready to go upon the lake, and insisted that he must accompany them, although he would have much preferred to find a shady spot and settle comfortably down to the new magazine which he had tucked into his pocket before starting.

The boat was large and roomy, easily accommodating them all, and the two brawny-armed boatmen propelled them over the lake with a stroke that was both steady and exhilarating.

They spent an hour or more thus, exploring many pretty coves and inlets, then settled down to the work of fishing beneath the cool shadows of some overhanging trees, and two hours more were passed in this fascinating sport, when, with a well-filled basket they returned to the shore, ready to enjoy the delicious lunch which their capacious hampers contained.

The grooms soon had the fish prepared and cooking over a fine bed of coals, the young ladies meanwhile laying the cloths and arranging the tempting viands, while their escorts did duty at making coffee and running at their bidding.

A merry time followed, as they replenished the inner man, told stories, sang rollicking college songs and tossed their jests back and forth with a spice and vim which betokened a thorough enjoyment of fun.

"Now, for the caves!" exclaimed Tom Radcliffe, when they finally arose from their feast and left the grooms and boatmen to take their turn.

"The caves!" repeated May, in a tone of surprise; what do you mean?"

"What, Miss Weston, have you lived within a dozen miles of this spot all your life and never heard of one of the greatest curiosities of the county?" queried Arthur Stamford, who had overheard her remark.

"I must certainly plead guilty," May returned, with a shy blush and smile, every tone of his voice sending a thrill of joy through her heart; "won't you please enlighten me?"

"With pleasure," he replied, coming to her side. "A short distance from here there are some very interesting caves and underground passages, which have excited the curiosity of many people regarding their formation and design. Some claim that they must have been the home or haunts of hermits ages ago; others that smugglers resorted to and occupied them while carrying on their nefarious traffic, for one passage runs down to the river, and there are various other stories afloat regarding them."

"How romantic! I have never been in such a place. I trust, however, that we shall not be suddenly confronted, in some dark and winding passage, by either recluse or smuggler," May laughingly rejoined.

"Do not fear, for am I not here to protect you?" the young man retorted, in the same spirit and striking a heroic attitude.

The words were lightly spoken, but they sent a lovely flush into May's cheeks and made her eyes gleam more brightly.

Judge Ashburton and Sir Arthur begged to be excused from joining in this excursion, and the young people started off in high spirits upon their exploring expedition, as soon as one of the boatmen, who was to act as their guide, was ready to accompany them.

They were obliged to walk a mile through the woods but to English lads and lasses this was nothing, especially as they found themselves so congenial to each other.

Upon reaching the entrance to the caves their guide produced candles, and after lighting them, presented each with one. The opening leading to the first cave was so narrow that they were obliged to go single file, but, after a little, as they began to descend, the place became wider and the roof more vaulted, while various passages stretched away in all directions. They explored them all, finding many curious formations of rock, and evidences that numerous other parties had been there before them, for names, signs and hieroglyphics of every nationality, craft and description had been carved here, there and everywhere.

They could not follow the passage which led to the sewer, the guide told them, because it grew so low toward the terminus that one would have to go upon his hands and knees and he never attempted to conduct parties beyond a certain point.

As they turned to retrace their steps, Alice and Grace Radcliffe, who had become quite friendly, paused, every now and then, to examine the walls, on either hand, and discuss their geological formation; thus becoming absorbed in their occupation and in each other, they gave no heed to the movements of the others of the party.

In this way their companions got on considerably in advance of them without their observing the fact, or, at least, without giving any special heed to it, for they had not a thought that they could be lost, for the lights were still distinctly visible.

At length, as they were passing on, Alice suddenly tripped and nearly fell.

"Oh! my shoe has come untied," she exclaimed. "Go on, Miss Radcliffe, and keep the lights in sight, and I will follow as soon as I can tie this string."

The young girl obeyed her, for she now realized how far they had fallen behind, and she thought to overtake the party and detain them until Alice could join them.

Alice carefully set her candle down, leaning it against the wall of the passage, then stooped to tie her shoe.

This was soon done, when she was ready to go on her way.

"Miss Radcliffe!" she called, as she saw that her companion had disappeared from her view.

But the girl had turned a corner and did not hear her. Alice caught up her candle to follow her, when she stumbled over a loose stone, dropped her taper and the next moment was in utter darkness.

"Miss Radcliffe," she called again, but only dismal, uncanny echoes answered her, and she began to think her situation decidedly uncomfortable, although she experienced no fear, for she felt sure that Will or someone would return for her as soon as she was missed.

But what was that? She surely had heard something or someone move almost beside her!

The next instant her heart leaped into her throat, and a thrill of terror went quivering through her, as a strong, firm hand grasped her arm and an unseen form obstructed her way, while a gruff voice muttered in her ear:

"Keep quiet! I have something to say to you."

CHAPTER VI.

A PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

For a moment after that iron hand closed over her arm Alice seemed to be frozen with fear.

Her heart drooped back into her bosom like a lump of lead, and every muscle in her body grew tense and rigid under the awful strain upon her nerves.

But the girl was possessed of a dauntless spirit, as we know, and almost immediately her courage arose to meet the emergency. She vigorously shook off the hand from her arm.

"Who are you?" she demanded, in a sharp, alert tone.

"It doesn't matter who I am," said the voice out of the darkness, "and we've no time to waste upon explanations. Tell me—do you come from Windsor?"

"Yes."

"Do you know a woman by the name of Ingraham, who lives at a place called Castleview?"

A shock went vibrating through Alice at this question.

What could a low creature, who, like an outlaw, was hiding in the bowels of the earth, know of Imogen Ingraham, or what could she have in common with him she wondered.

"Speak, can't you!" said the man, impatiently, as she hesitated.

"Yes, I know Mrs. Ingraham."

"Will you take a letter from me to her?"

Alice shrank with abhorrence from becoming the messenger from this mysterious unknown to the woman who was almost as repulsive to her.

"She is not at Castleview," she said; "she is away for the present."

The man ground his teeth in disappointment.

"Blast the luck!" he muttered, then added: "Do you know her address?"

"I do not."

"Well, will you get it—write it on the letter and post it for me?"

"Why do you not attend to the matter yourself?" Alice coldly demanded.

"That is impossible," the man returned, with a quick, indrawn breath. "I couldn't be asking questions at the office about her. Please oblige me, young lady," he pleaded, softening his tone. "It is a case of dire necessity or I would not ask it; I wouldn't have frightened you so, here in this uncanny place, if it had not been. But let me say—if the family at Castleview are your friends—do not let anyone know that you have met me, or that I made this request of you."

"Why?—why this mystery?" questioned Alice, with a cold chill. "No," she added, hastily, "I do not wish to have anything to do with the matter; I——"

"Miss Weston! Miss Weston! Where are you?" a clarion voice suddenly called, and sent a thrill of joy to the heart of the trembling girl.

"Here!" she returned, in resonant tone.

"Take the letter," said the voice beside her, and the missive was rudely thrust into her hand; then her unknown companion shuffled away in the darkness, and she was alone.

The next moment the glimmer of a candle appeared around a corner and Arthur Stamford stood before her.

He sprang to her side.

"My darling! My darling!" he breathed; "I feared you were lost."

He threw the light from his candle full upon her face, and bending down searched it eagerly.

"How pale you are! How you tremble! Were you frightened," he continued, tenderly.

"Yes, I began to be a trifle anxious," Alice returned, flushing hotly under his fond, solicitous look, and at his manner of addressing her; "my shoe lacing became loosened, and I stopped to tie it. I told Miss Radcliffe to go on and keep the rest of you in sight, and I would follow; but, unfortunately, I dropped my candle, which left me in darkness, and I could not find my way."

"Grace should not have left you alone," the young man returned; "these passages are very perplexing unless one knows them thoroughly. But the moment she overtook us I hurried back to find you."

"That was kind," said Alice, appreciatively, "but let us now hasten to rejoin our friends or they will also become uneasy about us."

She was most anxious to overtake them, because the secret which her companion had involuntarily betrayed upon finding her, had caused a feeling of blank dismay to take possession of her.

"Wait one moment, please, Miss Weston," the young man gravely returned, "for, in an unguarded moment, I have betrayed feelings which demand further explanations. Alice, I love you with all my heart—I have long loved you; yes, ever since that day when you found me wounded and bleeding and played the 'good Samaritan' to me. I should have told you this many months ago, but I was called so suddenly to my father that I had no opportunity. I might have written you, but I kept hoping that we should return and I could make my confession in person. Our absence was, however, prolonged, and now, coming upon you suddenly with a great fear in my heart, I have, perhaps, revealed my love at an awkward moment. But, dearest, my heart beats only for you—my future is in your keeping. Let me try to win you, Alice, for my wife; say that you return my affection—give me hope that you will some day be mine and let me prove to you how strong and true and loyal a heart you have won."

The kind heart of the gentle girl ached for him as she listened, for she saw that he was desperately in earnest and he had looked very manly and handsome as he pleaded his cause.

"Oh, Mr. Stamford!" she faltered, when he paused, and in a tone of deep distress; "why did you tell me this? I am so sorry. I——"

"Why did I tell you? Because I had to tell you. I must know my fate. And why are you 'sorry'?" he questioned, earnestly, as he bent nearer to search her face.

"Because—although I have the kindest regard for you, as a friend, I do not—I cannot return the love you offer me. I cannot be your wife," Alice sorrowfully replied.

"Miss Weston! Alice!" the young man exclaimed, in a voice of keen pain; "you must not tell me that I have been building a castle in the air—that there is no foundation for the fond hopes which I have been cherishing for more than three years."

"Indeed, I must," Alice gently though firmly returned; "but, if there has ever been anything in my manner toward you to encourage you to believe that I had the faintest suspicion of your regard for me, or that I could ever become your wife, I hope you will forgive me. I did not dream of such a thing; I—I thought that my sister was the attraction which drew you to Beechcote."

Arthur Stamford started violently and swept the beautiful face before him with a searching look.

"Can that be possible?" he cried; "have I indeed been such a blunderer? Ah! I begin to understand; there is another who has already won what I have sought; am I not right, Miss Weston?"

Alice flushed crimson, and her lovely eyes drooped.

She was not prepared for so direct a question, and since her engagement was still a secret, she hardly knew how to answer him.

There was only a momentary hesitation, however. She was not a girl to trifle with anyone—a straightforward course was and always had been the only possible course to her.

"No, Mr. Stamford," she said, at length, and meeting his eye with a kind, regretful look; "let me say again that I am deeply grieved by what you have told me; but truth is best and kindest, under all circumstances, and—I will tell you, in confidence, that what you have surmised is correct."

"And you are already pledged?" he breathed, in a scarcely audible tone.

"Yes."

There was a moment of utter silence.

Then Arthur Stamford observed, with a hopeless air and in a husky voice:

"Forgive me, then, for wounding you with the confession I have made; but pray assure me that I may still regard myself as numbered among your friends."

"Most certainly, and I feel honored to possess your friendship," Alice cordially returned. "And now——"

What she would have added was suddenly cut short by the appearance of another light in the passage, and the next moment they recognized their guide, who, wondering what could have detained them, had returned to look for them.

"Here you are!" the man observed, as he came up with them. "I told you how it would be if you didn't keep together—it's mighty easy to get lost down here. What has happened?" he concluded, regarding Alice's pale face, earnestly.

"Nothing very serious, Mr. Compton," young Stamford replied, and trying to speak in a natural tone. "Miss Weston stopped to tie a refractory shoe lacing, then dropped her candle and had to stay here in the dark until I found her; but let us get out of this gloomy place as soon as possible. I feel as if the sunshine would be very welcome."

"All right, come on," responded the man, as he turned to lead the way.

His companions followed closely, but they had not proceeded far when they met Mr. Marchmont coming to seek them. He and Tom Radcliffe had been ahead of the party, all of whom they supposed were closely following; but on reaching the entrance to the caves, they learned from Grace Radcliffe that Alice was behind, and both Mr. Stamford and the guide had gone in search of her.

This caused him some alarm, and he also turned immediately back to find his dear one.

"Has anything happened," he questioned, anxiously, as he reached the side of his betrothed, and caught her by the hand.

"Oh, no, and I am more sorry than I can express to have made so much trouble for everybody," Alice replied, with a little laugh, which she tried to make reassuring, but in which Will detected a nervous thrill.

"No one will mind the trouble, dear, so long as we have you safe," her lover replied, in a low voice, and giving the hand he held a fond pressure.

A few moments more served to bring them out into the fresh, sweet air and the welcome sunshine, and there was not one of the company who did not experience a sense of relief to be once more above ground.

"Ugh!" exclaimed Grace Radcliffe, shrugging her graceful shoulders. "I think hereafter I will be excused from exploring the bowels of the earth; the outside of it is entertaining enough for me."

"Why, Grace, you are actually shivering! Did you happen to encounter the ghost of a hermit or a smuggler, while you were poking about by yourself," inquired her brother, in a hectoring tone.

"No, but truly, I half expected to be confronted by one at every corner," she retorted, "I am not sure that Miss Weston may not have met one, after I left her, for she is as white as a ghost herself," she added, with a mischievous glance at Alice's pale cheeks.

Alice was a trifle dismayed to have the attention of the whole party thus directed to her, for her various experiences underground had somewhat unnerved her. Even now she could feel the pressure of that rude hand upon her arm, while the mysterious letter which she hastily concealed in her pocket, upon the appearance of Arthur Stamford, was a very disagreeable secret upon her conscience.

"I am very sorry to know that I give such a ghostly impression," she tried to say, lightly. "I am cold," she added, unable to repress a shiver of repulsion, "and am heartily glad to get into the sun again. I can assure you, however, that I met only human beings in my wanderings below."

But she was a long way from being as light-hearted as she had spoken, for she found her thoughts constantly reverting to the man whom she had encountered—wondering what he could have in common with Mrs. Ingraham and what secret was hidden in that letter in her possession and which she now regretted she had not thrust back upon its author, refusing to have anything to do with it.

Then, to, she was depressed in view of Arthur Stamford's unexpected confession of love. As she had told him she had never dreamed that she was the object of his frequent visits to Beechcote. She had always enjoyed his companionship, for he was very genial and entertaining; but, as he had laughed and jested most with May, who was of a more piquant temperament than herself, she had believed and hoped that he was seeking her sister who, she felt assured, loved him devotedly, and to whom she now feared it would be a terrible blow, if she should ever learn of his avowal that day to her.

The young people grouped themselves upon a great rock by the riverside, where they fell to chatting socially while they sunned themselves and waited for a fresh cup of coffee which one of the grooms was preparing for them.

Meantime, Sir Arthur Stamford and Judge Ashburton, who had refused to accompany the exploring party, had been having an interesting and somewhat remarkable conversation during the absence of their youthful companions.

Ordering a groom to bring some cushions from the carriages, they established themselves comfortably under the shadows of a wide-spreading tree, each with a fragrant Havana between his lips, and proceeded to become better acquainted with each other.

"My son tells me that you have been located at Castleview for a number of years," Sir Arthur observed, by way of opening the conversation.

"Yes; my son-in-law purchased the estate some seven years ago," the judge replied.

"I have never been to Castleview since Lord Ellerton went to India and to his death," Sir Arthur remarked, a shade of sadness stealing over his face. "We were very close friends, and his untimely end was a great shock to me. I have myself been in poor health during most of this time, and have been obliged to live abroad, thus I have never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Fletcher. I shall, however, seek his early acquaintance, now that I am home again and in a better condition to make new friends. Allow me to say I find the way very pleasantly paved to the acquaintance by our meeting of today," he concluded, genially.

"Thank you; I assure you that the pleasure is mutual," cordially returned the judge. "You will find my son a fine fellow and stanch friend; he is, however, away from home just at present."

"Ah! will he return soon?"

"In a week or so, I think, unless something unforeseen occurs; meantime, Will and I are keeping bachelors' hall, since the ladies are also away."

"Young Marchmont seems a fine, promising fellow," Sir Arthur observed, shooting a keen look at his companion.

"Yes, Will is a nice boy; an exceptionally nice boy," said the judge, in a gratified tone.

"He mentioned to me that Mr. Fletcher is his guardian—has he been under his care long?" queried the baronet, as he flicked the ashes from his cigar.

"Since he was five or six years of age."

"Is he an orphan—are neither of his parents living?"

"Not to my knowledge," replied Judge Ashburton, with a note of reserve in his tone.

Sir Arthur glanced up at him, scrutinizing his face sharply.

"Pray do not think me unduly inquisitive," he said, "but the young man interests me. It he a relative of either yourself or Mr. Fletcher?"

"No."

There was an awkward pause after that briefly intoned monosyllable, during which the baronet appeared to be struggling with some embarrassment or emotion, his companion was at a loss to decide which.

"Has—the young man a middle name?" he questioned, after a moment.

"Yes—'Curtis'!"

"Heavens!" burst from Sir Arthur's pale lips as he sat suddenly erect.

BREAD FROM TULIP BULBS.—On account of the scarcity of wheat in Holland the Association of Dutch Bakers has sanctioned the use of a so-called "tulip bread" in which one third of the flour used is made from ground tulip bulbs. The bread is said to be very nourishing and the war ministry has recommended its use in the army.

UNIQUE TATTLE-TALE LAW.—The first arrest in the history of California under the statute which makes it a misdemeanor to give information to any employer that an employee has served time in prison was made at San Francisco recently. Peter Wirt, sentenced in Los Angeles to a year in San Quentin for assault with a deadly weapon, complained to his parole officer, that his roommate, Frederick Schroeder, a painter, had informed their landlady against him. The parole officer had Schroeder arrested and appeared against him in court. Decision was reserved.

Origin of Rhode Island Reds

SO many farmers as well as regular poultry people, are keeping Rhode Island Reds to the exclusion of all other chickens, which is not strange when one considers their splendid laying and table qualities, which have established them firmly as the head of the general purpose type of fowl, that many of our COMFORT subscribers have asked me for information about the origin and development of the breed, and I have, after some trouble, succeeded in getting what I think is authentic information. Two men, John Macomber and William Tripp, of a small town in Massachusetts, which was called Westport about fifty years ago, but which has been rechristened, and is now known as Central Village, made a business of buying up fowls through the country for the New Bedford market, and as the supply was not always satisfactory, they determined to try breeding something better than the average bird they could pick up. They wanted a breed of good size and quick growth. They did a whole lot of crossing with all sorts of birds, without any regard for beauty, shape or plumage, for both men were busy, and only cared for market qualities, and probably it was just the fact that size and health was selected in all the ancestral matings that has made the breed so strong and vigorous. According to the data collected by the Agricultural Station at Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1900, Mr. Tripp was the one who eventually carried out the idea of establishing a new breed on strictly general purpose lines. Judging from several accounts given by neighbors, and Mr. Tripp's son and daughter, the original crosses made by both Mr. Tripp and Mr. Macomber were between the old red Shanghai and Cochin China birds, though at some subsequent time Malay and Brahma blood was introduced, and Mr. Tripp's son, in a letter written some years ago to the Agricultural Station, mentions the fact that at one time his father tried introducing both Brahma and Wyandotte blood, but did not like the result nearly as well as the old breeds, and so dropped it, and built up a new flock by selecting the best hens from his own old matings, and the best cockerels from Mr. Macomber's stock. Both of the gentlemen having passed away before any real investigation started, we have to depend on others for information. Several interesting points are stated in a letter written by a Mr. George T. Howard, of Little Compton, Rhode Island, Experiment Station, in 1900.

"The Rhode Island Reds originated on the farm of William Tripp (now deceased.) This man raised them for a good many years, and after a time other people around town got them. They were called the 'Bill Tripp' fowl. Finally someone from out of town, I think, came through the town, bought up some of the best of them, and took them to some poultry show and called them Rhode Island Reds. I think they are a very good fowl for this climate, and am raising them altogether at present."

Mr. P. H. Wilbour, son of Isaac C. Wilbour, who was one of the veteran poultry raisers and handlers of Little Compton, writes:

"A few years ago Miss Rebecca, daughter of William Tripp, informed me that a certain Dr. Aldrich came there and bought a few pullets and cockerels. He exhibited them, calling them Rhode Island Reds, and this is the first intimation that she had of the name—R. I. Reds."

All of which goes to prove that to Mr. William Tripp is due the honor of originating one of the best utility fowls the world has ever known, for they lay large brown eggs and develop plumy breasts and shanks at an early age, so are good table birds at all ages.

A letter from Dr. Aldrich furnishes such explanatory history that I give it in full:

"In 1890 I could not obtain any history of the Rhode Island Reds outside of the territory bounded by the Seaconnet river, the Atlantic ocean, the east branch of Westport river, and the Massachusetts line. The great poultry farmers on the south shore, Sisson, Tripp, Seabury, Manchester, Beebe, Brown, Wilbour, etc., all bred Rhode Island Reds in 1890, and fine flocks they were. At Miss Tripp's, north of the south shore (one mile from Levi Sisson's) I obtained the history of her flock that dated back forty years (now sixty-four years). She remembered her father bringing the red rooster home, and they have bred the fowls ever since. There were rose and single comb fowls. I should say more rose than single. At Tiverton Four Corners, in 1891, I obtained as fine a specimen of rose-combed Rhode Island Red cock as I ever saw in my life, red to the skin, and today his blood is undoubtedly to be found in some of the best strains of Buff Wyandottes as well as in some good strains of Rhode Island Reds. The first Reds on the Island of Rhode Island were at Bateman's Point, Newport, from my eggs. Later they were found in the neighborhood of Portsmouth. In 1891 or 1892 I found practically no Rhode Island Reds on the Island, or east of Hick's Bridge, so-called, except one flock on the road to Horseneck. Between Westport river and New Bedford there were no Reds in the early nineties. Tolman's Reds (Bay View House, Tiverton), were raised from eggs obtained from Mr. Cottrell in 1892 or 1893. Mr. Cottrell's Reds were called Red Malays. They were all single comb (not a rose comb in the flock) and some of the best Buff Rock strains date back to these single comb Reds of Mr. Cottrell's. In the Tiverton country the Reds were not rose comb, but single, and were called Malays more often than they were called Rhode Island Reds. These Reds had no suggestion of Leghorn blood in them. The rose comb Rhode Island Reds now in Tiverton were obtained in Little Compton. At Westport (head of river) the Reds looked 'Leghorny.' There was no doubt some rose comb Leghorn blood was in some of the flocks. At Central Village the Rhode Island Reds were rose and single comb, and were bred in large numbers by Mr. Booth and Mr. Kirby (both of whom are now dead) and others, between Central Village, Hick's Bridge, and Westport Point. At Little Compton there were rose and single Rhode Island Reds. I have no doubt the rose comb came from the rose comb Shanghai cock rather than from any Wyandotte or rose comb Leghorn blood, although the latter could occasionally be seen quite plainly. Very little Wyandotte blood could be found. Occasionally some white Wyandotte blood could be found, introduced from cockerels raised by Fred Bowen of Fall River, but the rose comb, I am sure, antedated any introduction of Wyandotte or Leghorn blood, that is, in the neighborhood of Little Compton."

A study has been made of the fowls of succeeding generations, and the endeavor has been o correct the standard to correspond as nearyly as might be with the characteristics of the best specimens obtained in the process.

The standard in use at the Rhode Island Experiment Station is herewith submitted, in response to numerous requests for the same from poultrymen interested in the advancement of this valuable variety of fowls:

Rhode Island Reds, Male

Weights: Cock, eight pounds; cockerels, seven pounds.

Comb: Pea, of medium size, having the appearance of three single combs joined together at the base, the center division being straight from front to rear, evenly serrated into not less than five points, highest in center, the side divisions slightly curved with not less than four serrations and merging into the central division at front and rear; bright red in color.

Defects: Comb, when too large and inclined to one side, or having insufficient "channels" between divisions, or excessively large, cut one half to even two points according to degree. Combs other than pea, or so loose as to fall from side to side, refuse score-card recorded.

Head: Medium in length, skull wide, the crown slightly overhanging the eyes. Face bright red, showing free of feathers well above the eyes, eyes bright bay. Ear lobes and wattles fine in texture, well developed, clearly defined, and bright red in color. Beak stout at base and well curved to point, yellow or horn color shading to yellow, and may have a dark stripe down the upper mandible.

Defects: When depressed in front of eye, wattles too small and rudimentary, beak slightly turned to one side, cut one half to one and one half according to degree. When beaks are crossed or wattles absent in males, refuse score-card record.

Neck: Medium in length, nicely curved, hackle abundant and flowing well over the shoulders and cape. Color bright ferruginous, free from color other than as described.

Defects: Hackle too short, or failing to cover shoulder and cape; black appearing in a stripe, white in undercolor; cut one half to one and one half according to degree.

Back: Medium long, back proper mahogany bay in color, shading from back proper into a rich ferruginous saddle, hangers falling well down over the points of the wing bay.

Defects: Narrow or pinched in saddle; oval or roached back; white in undercolor or black in surface color; cut one half or one and one half according to degree. Pass as unworthy when the shell bone is crooked or one or both hips are slipped.

Breast: Full and round from shoulder to shoulder and from throat to keel bone, making the quarters prominent, color rich ferruginous red, shading into a lighter hue of the same in the undercolor.

Defects: Wedge-shaped from quarters to keel; white in undercolor; surface too light in shade; cut one half to one point for each.

Body and Fluff: Keel bone straight, well supplied with muscles from front to rear, color same as that of breast, shading lighter to the fluff.

Defects: Crooked keel; keel muscles shrunken; drab color in the surface or white in the undercolor; cut one half to one and one half according to degree.

Wings: Medium in size; with points well covered by saddle hangers. Color of wingbow, mahogany bay; of coverts, rich ferruginous, forming wing-bar; of primaries, black and rich ferruginous, black predominating lower edge of lower web laced with rich ferruginous; of secondaries, lower portion of lower web rich ferruginous sufficient to create wing-bay of this shade, the same color going about the point of the feather, lacing the upper portion of the upper web, this upper lacing growing wider as the secondaries comb upwards, the five feathers between secondaries proper and back taking on a surface color to match that of back and cape.

Defects: Loosely-folded primaries; twisted feathers in primaries or secondaries; white or gray appearing in any part; cut one half to one and one half according to degree. Pass as unworthy twenty per cent of white or gray, or primaries folded outside of secondaries.

Tail: Carried tolerably upright, spread laterally, extending at an angle as seen in the capital letter A, not too closely combed; sickles, lesser sickles and larger tail coverts extending well beyond tail proper. Tail proper, sickles, lesser sickles and coverts black; lesser coverts black with a rich green sheen.

Defects: White or gray in any part; too small or pinched; sickles straight; cut one half to one and one half. For carriage between thirty-five degrees and full squirrel position, cut one half to one and one half points. When carried positively to one side pass the specimen as unworthy.

Legs: Thighs medium in length with heavy muscles; color of plumage rich ferruginous. Shanks and feet yellow or reddish yellow, smooth in scale, and free from feathers or down.

Defects: Thighs too long; knees slightly turned inward; hock failing to show in profile below body line; cut out half to one and one half according to degree. Shanks too light in color, cut one half to one and one half according to degree. Single crooked toes cut one point. Pass as unworthy generally deformed feet; positive knocked knees; and any other color than the shades of yellow.

Undercolor: Shafts (quills) of feathers matching surface color, fiber of lighter shade of same or mixed with gray.

Defects: White or black or any color other than described.

Rhode Island Reds, Female

Weights: Hen, six and one half pounds; pullet, five and one half pounds.

Comb: Pea, like that of the male, only smaller in proportion to weight of fowl.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Head: Medium long, skull medium wide, the crown slightly overhanging the eyes, face deep, the red showing well above the eyes. Eyes bright bay. Ear lobes and wattles fine in texture, small but distinct and bright red in color. Beak medium stout at base, well curved to point, yellow or horn color shading to yellow and may have a dark stripe down the upper mandible.

Defects: Same as for male except as indicated.

Neck: Medium in length and slightly arched, rich ferruginous color, free from black or any other color than described. Hackle sufficiently long to cover cape and shoulders.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Back: Medium long, cape medium broad and flat over small of back, which with back proper to hips makes a slightly inclined plane, the saddle taking a concave sweep to tail, plumage fairly abundant and of a rich ferruginous color.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Breast: Round and full, quarters prominent, muscles heavy, shoulder muscles rounding to keel-bone, color ferruginous.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Body and Fluff: Keel-bone straight with full keel muscles, color matching the breast and shading lighter to fluff, which is medium in development.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Wings: Bow well rounded, and in color rich ferruginous to match saddle proper, the coverts rich in a lighter shade of same color; primaries rich ferruginous and black, the former predominating; secondaries, rich ferruginous, in lower web of sufficient width to secure the wing-bay of that color and turning the point and lacing or penciling the upper web of the secondaries in the same color, the balance of each feather may be black, the five feathers between secondaries and back matching the back and saddle in surface color.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Tail: Tail carried tolerably upright, spread laterally, extending at an angle as seen in the capital letter A, not too closely combed. Tail coverts moderately developed and showing the tips of the tail proper to the rear of the same. Tail proper, dark chestnut in color which may shade into black at tips of feathers, coverts a rich ferruginous color.

Defects: Same as described for male except as to sickles.

Legs: Thighs medium in length with heavy muscles, feathered in a rich ferruginous color. Shanks and feet smooth in scale, yellow or may become straw colored with age.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Undercolor: Shafts. (quills) if feathers matching surface color, fiber of lighter shade of same or mixed with gray.

Defects: Same as described for male.

The weights are heavy enough to ensure a reasonably heavy carcase when dressed for market, and yet light enough to retain the excellent egg-producing quality of the breed. The breeder with late-hatched chicks also has a chance at these weights in the fall shows.

The surface color of plumage should show red all over the fowl without striking contrasts in shades except for the black of wing and tail feathers. The surface color should not be endangered by excessive attention to undercolor. If the dark gray or slate undercolor is necessary to retain a sufficiently deep surface color, or if it is correlated with the vigor and virility of the breed, it should not be sacrificed.

Strength of color in the young fowls is desirable, since the color is liable to fade with age, especially in females.

Breeders of single and rose comb Rhode Island Reds will very lightly insist that these varieties be allowed. The pea comb has the advantage of being very well adapted to the cold and variable climate of Rhode Island and the states of like latitude. It does not bring the breed into close competition with the buff varieties of Wyandottes and Plymouth Rocks. Several prominent members of the American Poultry Association have expressed the opinion that the pea comb Rhode Island Red would be readily recognized and admitted as a breed by the said association. Whether it is best to subject the breed to the somewhat artificial conditions entailed by the rules and regulations of the above-mentioned association is a question to be settled by the breeders.

The aim has been to breed to a standard which would allow typical fowls of both sexes to be produced from "single matings." It is to be hoped that breeders of Rhode Island Reds will continue steadfast in the purpose to perfect this breed according to a standard which will not necessitate resorting to the unnatural scheme of "double matings" (so-called). It is also very desirable to so manage the breed that it shall retain its qualities of utility while gaining in uniformity, symmetry and beauty.

Correspondence

P. G., Jersey.—I have bought a new farm of about thirty acres, containing two chicken-houses. (1) How many chickens can I have in these houses? (2) How shall I situate these houses: on the ground, or elevated three feet above the ground? (3) Is it better to make the chickens run at large, or have them yarded? (4) How many acres of corn, wheat, buckwheat, etc., do I need to feed three hundred chickens a year? (5) What kind of trees do you think are good to make shade for the chickens in summer?

A.—You don't give the size of chicken-houses, so I can't say how many they will accommodate, but the general rule is five square feet of floor space to each bird. (2) If the ground is well drained, it is better to have houses built on the ground, especially for winter layers, as they are warmer and freer from drafts. (3) Laying hens are better yarded; growing birds and breeding stock are better kept on free range. (4) The answer to this question depends on so many conditions (ground, care of crops, climatic conditions) that I don't feel competent to give it. (5) Plum, peach or pear trees are the best to plant in poultry yards. If I can be of any further assistance to you, please write again.

M. C.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my chickens. When they first take sick their heads hang right down to the ground, a little water runs from the mouth and the eyes are wet. They drop to the ground and stay there unless disturbed, with the head hanging and eyes closed, for two or three hours—sometimes longer, and before they die they flop like one with its head off. Our chickens have free range; they rustle their own living during summer from stubble fields and haystacks and Alfalfa fields. They have always been healthy—our only depredation is coyotes. The hens have been laying good. Seven died yesterday—all hens and pullets. No rootsers yet affected.

A.—The hens have limberneck, which much resemble ptomaine poisoning, which human beings get by eating meat, fish or canned goods. Fowls usually get it by eating the flesh of some dead animal; often a chicken which has died in some remote corner and escaped notice, a rat or wild bird. In hot weather such carcases become infested with maggots within twenty-four hours, and chickens will eat a great quantity of such things, which of course upsets their digestive organs and creates a condition resembling ptomaine poisoning. This reacts on the nervous system and causes a muscular contraction which affects the neck. Unless the bird is noticed soon after having eaten the putrid meat or maggots, there is little chance of saving its life. The best treatment is to administer a dose of turpentine and sweet oil—a teaspoonful of the former and two tablespoonfuls of the latter to three tablespoonfuls of Castor oil. Repeat the dose in about three hours.

B. H. C.—I keep the Light Brahma chickens, and one of my year-old hens has a scum-like, with a dot-like place on one eye; is healthy otherwise and lays. I wish you could help me and others on this subject. I can't find anything about it in my poultry book. Sisters, do any of you have this breed? Did you ever use remedies with success?

A.—The bird has what is called keratitis, which is inflammation of the outer membranes covering the pupil of the eye. Remove the bird to a dry, warm place which can be kept almost dark. Bathe the eyes with cold water containing a little dioxogen: then anoint the inner part of the lid with an ointment made of ten grains of finely-powdered iodoform in an ounce of vaseline. Then mix the following in equal parts: Pulverized camphor, boric acid, and sub-nitrate of bismuth. Mix thoroughly, and blow through a quill into the nostrils.

J. C. L.—I wish you would tell me what ails my chicks and how to cure them. They first get dumpish, and a white substance gathers under their eyelids; it grows fast and soon makes them blind. These chicks are broiler size; they eat and drink until they get blind, then they remain quiet and stupid for a few days and die. I feed them a variety of good healthy food, such as wheat, corn, and mash of bran, corn-meal, and steamed Alfalfa meal, grit, shells and charcoal always before them. There are about one hundred in a large wire netting yard, and their perch in warm weather is in a roomy shed open in front.

A.—From your description I don't quite understand the trouble your birds are suffering from, so can only suggest that you read the answer to B. H. C., and try the same remedies, as they are sure to be helpful in any trouble of the eye.

C. F. H.—Have been a subscriber to COMFORT for ten years. As I pass it along when I finish reading them, I have none for reference. Would like to have more information about my chickens. They are about five months old, and have done fine until lately. They seem to sneeze all the time. A substance comes out of their noses; does not smell bad. I opened it and it had white spots on the membrane around the heart, and going up in the neck. The gall was large and dark green. At first I fed them chick feed (bought ready mixed). When they were six weeks old I fed Kaffir corn. Am now feeding barley. They have free range. Have been putting coal oil in their drinking water. My neighbors' chickens have bunches on the sides of the chickens' heads between the nose holes and the eyes. The eyes finally swell shut, and matter runs out of their eyes. When you press on the bunches the matter comes out of the roofs of their mouths, and out of the nose holes. Do you think my chickens have the beginning of that disease, whatever it is?

A.—I fear you have rather a hard case to fight, as the description of spots around the heart suggests that the birds are affected by a mold-spore, known as aspergillosis. It is quite a common fungus. It grows and thrives on numerous materials, such as moldy hay, straw, grain, old litter and manure. Fowls usually become affected through damp, mouldy bedding or grain, and the warmth and moisture of the bird's body are especially favorable to the development of the

This Little Girl Had A Spinal Deformity

Little Miss Taylor had Potts Disease, a progressive, destructive disease of the spinal column, usually tubercular, and often accompanied by paralysis. The trouble in this case had been in existence three years when her mother, Mrs. W. S. Taylor, R. F. D. No. 2, Clinton, Ind., brought the child to this Sanitarium, Feb. 22, 1910. At that time, because of the disease and deformity of the spine, the child's head was forced forward—her chin in contact with her chest.

This picture, recently taken, shows her condition and appearance at this time. Write Mrs. Taylor. In treatment of this case plaster paris was not used. The

Mental Telepathy

By E. Byron Wilbur

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"DO you believe in mental telepathy, or the sympathetic affection or influence of one mind over another without the use of words, signs or other visible means of communication?"

"Well I never did either, until I was about twenty years old," said Aunt Kate, one evening as we were gathered around the fireside. "In fact I had never heard very much about it until afterward," she said.

It was along late in December and we had little else to do in the evenings except read or tell stories, and of late Aunt Kate had been telling some pretty good ones, so we were all eager to hear what we knew was coming, another one of her stories. Only this time it was to be a true one, as we knew from the way she began.

"Oh, do tell us about it, Aunt Kate," we cried in chorus.

"All right," she said. "Now be good children while I tell you the story."

"You have all heard more or less about Dick, haven't you? I don't often speak of him but I am sure you all know of him and the story I am going to tell you now is of how I met him and of a strange experience we had of thought transmission."

Here she stopped to wipe away the tears that persisted in coming into her eyes.

"Oh, don't tell us if it makes you cry, Aunt Kate," said my younger sister, who was always too tender hearted to even hurt a fly.

"Now don't mind me," said Aunt Kate, "I may as well tell you even if it does bring back old memories.

"When I was nineteen, father died. In those days when a man died he did not leave a fortune or a life insurance policy for his family and it usually befell the older children to take care of the family and the farm until the younger children were old enough to take care of themselves. And so it was in our case. My brother took up the farm work and as we all had to help in some way, it was decided that if I could secure the place, I was to teach the district school to supply what ready money we needed. By great good luck (for me) the last teacher had just been married, so when I applied for the position the school board was only too glad to let me have the place.

"I taught all who came throughout the fall and winter and liked the work, so when they offered me the position for another year, I accepted eagerly.

"It was in the early fall that I met Dick (his real name was Richard Carothers), but we all called him Dick. He was coming along the trail with his axe over his shoulder—but I had better tell you how he happened to be in our country at all. You see it was the same old story of the city man with the failing health. His doctor had sent him West for his health and he was building a cabin over by the river, and intended to hunt and trap, that winter as he thought the long tramps would give him the needed exercise and fresh air besides being good sport. It was from his work on the cabin that he was returning when I saw him on the occasion that I now speak of.

"Well, as I said, he was coming along the trail by the schoolhouse just as I was letting the children go home one evening, and he stopped for a chat and then walked along home with me. He was a handsome fellow, tall, broad shouldered and deep chested, with dark brown hair and blue eyes. Two months in the open air had already done wonders for him and to look at him now one would not think he had ever been sick a day in his life. I had met him formally at a quilting bee over at the house where he was staying while he built his cabin, when he first arrived so we were not quite strangers, although I did not pay much attention to him at the time. But that was because I was shy and a bit bashful, for I liked him even then.

"Dick soon became a regular caller at our house and the neighbors began to whisper that they might need a new teacher before long.

"One day Dick went to town and on his next visit he presented me with a beautiful little pearl-handled revolver. He said he would teach me to use it too, because even if I never needed it, it would do no harm to know how anyway, and one never could tell when the occasion might arise when a weapon would be a good thing to have around. He hoped though, that I would never find any use for it other than shooting at a mark.

"We spent a good many pleasant afternoons and evenings together, he teaching me to shoot, until I finally became a pretty fair marksman.

"Then winter came on and I believe it was one of the most severe winters I had ever seen. The cold was fearful and the snow was so deep that it covered the fences, what few there were. All the wild things soon began to suffer and the wolves were getting so bold as to attack people occasionally. But most of these attacks were only rumors from places far from our neighborhood. Nevertheless I began to carry my little revolver. My brothers made fun of me for carrying such a toy. They wanted me to carry a rifle, but I had lots of faith in my little pistol, partly because Dick gave it to me I suppose, so I went on carrying it just the same. Nothing had bothered me so far and I had not seen a sign of a wild animal for so long that I was beginning to think it was all a scare anyway.

"One day I had been giving the children some examinations and that evening I stayed a little late working on the papers, correcting and grading them. Before I realized it, it was getting late, and I knew that I would be caught by darkness before I could get home unless I hurried. I did not fancy the prospect, so I hurried.

"I had not gone far before I thought saw something in the timber off to the left of the trail. Soon I saw it again and this time I knew I was not mistaken. It was a big timber wolf. I soon saw more of them and once, on turning around suddenly, I saw two or three of them skulking along behind me altogether too close for comfort.

"I began to wish someone would come. I did not care much who it was, but vaguely I wished it would be Dick. Soon I saw wolves ahead of me and then upon rounding a bend in the road, there stood two big brutes squarely in the middle of the trail with their mouths wide open for all the world as though they were laughing at me. I stopped as they showed no desire or intention of moving and looked around. On all sides of me, in front and behind, there were more wolves, all at about the same distance from me.

"I opened my lunch box and took out the scraps. These I threw as far as I could to one side, thinking to attract their attention while I made good my escape. Only the ones on that side so much as moved, the rest all sat back on their haunches and watched to see what I would do next.

"The situation was getting desperate. I knew that before long it would be getting dark and they would gradually close in on me, so that I must do something while I still had light. The wolves knew it too. Cowardly brutes. One could see that they were only waiting for the feast till there would be no danger in the taking of it. But I made up my mind that they should not feast on me if I could help it.

"I took out the little pistol Dick had given me, thank Heaven I still had some means of defense. Oh, if he were only here, he would show them. Dick, Dick, I thought, where are you?

"I took careful aim at the nearest wolf and pulled the trigger. I killed him, too, thanks to Dick's training. The rest of them started a quarrel over the body of their late comrade and seeing my chance, I ran for home as fast as I could go.

"They must have finished him at a mouthful, for I soon heard them coming again behind me. I turned and fired a few shots at them but they only scattered and surrounded me as before. And my cartridges were nearly all gone too. Oh, why didn't someone come. I finally gave it up. The only thing for me to do was to climb a tree, there I could stay until morning or help came or I froze to death. I knew that the folks at home would not think anything of my absence as I sometimes went home with one of the children to spend the night. Usually I told them of it beforehand but they would not worry if I did not. So I hardly dared hope for help from that quarter.

"I crept over toward the nearest tree. It was not very large but it looked easy to climb. When I got close to it I suddenly threw down my lunch box and books and scrambled up to the first branches. Quick as I was though, the wolves were almost as quick, for as I swung up on a branch one of them jumped and caught my skirt, tearing out a piece of it and carrying it away with him. This made me lose my temper and I fired my last cartridge at him. I hit him, too, and then had to sit and look on while the rest devoured him.

"And I thought that soon, perhaps, they would be tearing me to pieces as they were their late fellow. For there was no way to get help. Even if I had been on the ground I had no way of signaling for help. I could not build a fire and if I could the smoke of it would not be seen at any distance, for it was too near dark. While we still had an hour or more of twilight the sun was so far down that it was already too dark for smoke to be seen, at the same time being light enough so that the light of a fire would not be seen.

"Then it was that I thought of a story I had once read, in which a girl brought her lover to her rescue just by thinking steadily of him. I had never read or heard much else about it. All I knew was that one had to center the mind on the person and the message to be conveyed, and repeat the message over and over, not allowing anything to interrupt the train of thought.

"I resolved to try it. It would do no harm and I was willing to do almost anything to get safely out of my predicament, and Dick would be the person I would call for.

"Then I thought steadily and clearly, 'Oh, Dick, come to me, I am in danger, come to me.' I think I must have repeated those words to myself for half an hour or more. It was beginning to get dusk and I knew that it would soon be dark. Help must come soon if it was coming, for the wolves were getting excited at the thought of being cheated out of their prey for so long and a few of them were clawing and biting at the base of the tree. And to my astonishment they were making fair headway too. The trunk was nearly one third bitten off before I noticed what they were about, so absorbed had I been with my thoughts.

"For the first time I began to be really alarmed, for now I was entirely at their mercy. My cartridges were all gone and I knew that the instant the tree fell it would be all over with me. The fall would likely stun me and even if it did not I was without means of defense. Then, too, I was getting stiff and numb from sitting so long in one position in the cold and I realized that I would soon be freezing.

"By this time the whole pack were biting and tearing furiously at the tree. Occasionally one would leap at me even though I was well out of reach. And when he would strike the tree with his paws I could feel the stem quiver under the impact. By this I knew that the end was not far away.

"I began to say my final prayer. I had prayed before but now that I saw the end drawing nearer and nearer I prayed to our Father to take me into His arms and let me dwell in His kingdom forever. And I think I prayed for almost everyone I knew and that I might meet them in the Great Beyond.

"Just as I finished my prayer a great brute leaped higher than the rest and struck square against the tree high up and I heard the wood crack and felt myself sway back and forth as you have seen a nest swing in the topmost branches of a tree. If there had been a spark of hope left in me it died then. I gave myself completely into His hands as I sank back patiently waiting for the final crash that would seal my doom.

"C-r-a-c-k. I started up, thinking it was the final rending of the tree. But no, there beneath the tree lay a wolf in his death struggle. Even then I could not realize what it meant. I did not understand that rescue was at hand, that I was saved.

"C-r-a-c-k. This time a little nearer, and one more of the pack fell. Then three more shots in quick succession. The pack was dwindling rapidly under that unerring fire.

"By this time the rest of them were beginning to realize that it was no safe place for a real, live, respectable wolf and after a few more shots they turned and ran like gray shadows into the timber.

"The last few shots had been fired close at hand and I tried to turn to see who my deliverer was who used the rifle with such accuracy. But I could not, I was too stiff and numb to move.

"'Well, little girl, they most had you that time,' said a familiar voice, behind me, 'Just wait a minute and I'll have you out of this.'

"I tried to speak but my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. Rescue had come after I had given up all hope, and the shock was too great, I could not utter a sound.

"Then Dick, for it was no one else, stepped around where he could see my face. I don't know how I looked, but he said afterward that I had the expression of one who had looked death in the face. 'Why, what's the matter, Kate?' said he, 'you look as though you had seen a ghost.' Still I could not answer. And not one word could I say until he had put me safely on the ground.

"Then I cried, 'Oh, Dick, I thought you never would come.'

"'Why little girl,' said he, looking puzzled, 'did you send for me?'

"'No, Dick,' said I, 'only in my mind. But how did you happen to come this way?' For you see I was curious to know if he had received my message, as I knew it was out of his way to come over this trail.

"'Well,' said he, 'I had been over to Pearson's this afternoon and I did not get started home until late. I was tramping along through the woods when I seemed to hear someone calling me. At first I could not make out who it was, and then it came again and I knew it was you. Even then I thought nothing of it, for I had been thinking of you and I thought it was just my fancy. But the call came so insistently that I stopped and listened. This time you seemed to be calling for help and I heard my name. I didn't wait any longer, but set out for your house to see if you were there and to satisfy myself that you were all right, for I knew I could not rest until I did.

"'Somewhat to my surprise, they said you were not at home, when I reached there but that you had probably gone home with one of the neighbor girls for the night. You see I still wouldn't believe it was anything but my imagination.

"'I didn't say anything, but somehow I knew better, right then, and I didn't want to lose time explaining things. So I made tracks for the schoolhouse as fast as I could go, for I thought that if I did not find you there, I should find something to tell me where you had gone.

"'So I was not greatly surprised when I saw the wolf pack under this tree, and I opened fire on them at long range, even at the risk of hitting you if a bullet should glance. I kept on firing as I came up, and, well, here I am and mighty glad to get here in time to save you. From the looks of this tree I was not much too soon, either.'

"We walked home together, he helping me along with his arm around me, for I was completely exhausted. I tried to thank him but somehow I couldn't. Before we got home, Dick had managed to say that he would like to protect me from wolves and everything else all the rest of our lives and I had told him that he could. So when we reached home we had a very happy story to tell, for all of my dangerous experience.

"And Dick put the ring on my finger then and there. He said he had bought it long before. Dear old Dick, I guess he knew how I felt toward him, though I had tried not to show it. It's pretty hard to fool the man you love if he loves you, he is almost sure to find out your real feelings for him. Sometimes even before you are aware of them yourself.

"That was over fifteen years ago, but I recall it all as clearly as though it were but yesterday. The only really happy days of my life."

"Well, but what became of Dick," we asked, "did he die, or what?"

"No children, he did not die, at least not that I ever heard of. But I will tell you the best I can.

"The following spring we had a quarrel over some trifling matter. The first quarrel. In the heat of passion I gave him back the ring and told him I never wanted to see him again. Poor Dick, and I know he loved me so much. I was sorry before he was out of sight but I was too proud to call him back.

"I heard, a year or so later that he had gone back home and gone into his father's steel mills. They say he is now one of the greatest steel magnates in this country.

"He has never married either. I have read of him in the daily papers a great deal and have seen his picture on the front page once or twice. The same old Dick, only perhaps a little older looking and with a few lines about the mouth and eyes. His only ambition seems to be to make money, for they say he does not pay any attention to the many ladies who are constantly 'fishing' for him.

"Perhaps sometime I may see him again. Who knows? I seem to have lost control or something or I could bring him back to me in the same way that I caused him to come to me the other time. Heaven knows I have tried hard enough, but perhaps he has turned against me and will not answer the call even though he hears it. I can't blame him if he has.

"But dears, remember this, if you ever have a love affair—and you will have—don't let any petty quarrel arise between you, and never part in anger, for pride is a powerful agent especially when wounded, and if you let it master you, you are almost sure to live to regret it, the same as I have.

"Now, good night children, that is all of my story, and it is time you were all in bed. I hope my next story will not be so sad as this one. I will try to think of a funny one for tomorrow night. Good night."

The Poor Little Czarevitch

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

RUSSIA, as everybody knows is honeycombed with anarchists and no ruler is more in danger of assassination than the czar, so for this reason he is guarded day and night by intrepid soldiers and a large corps of detectives in civil dress but even with all this precaution, the "Little Father" of 175,000,000 people, Nicholas II is fearful each day that intrigue or conspiracy may at any moment end his life. In spite of his power, his immense wealth and the measures taken to protect the imperial family of Russia, the czar is very unhappy knowing that his son, the young czarevitch is an invalid and cripple. In the face of the most rigid censorship, even the peasants in the most remote provinces of the Muscovite empire know by this time that the heir to the Russian throne, the Czarevitch Alexis, may never be able to succeed his father.

Alexej Nikolajewich comes, as far as blood is concerned, from the strongest, healthiest and most vigorous family of all the rulers in Europe, but owing to the lack of political stability in Russia many members of the family have died at a comparatively early age, not from any hereditary disease, but by an assassin's hand. The life of the present emperor has been threatened more frequently than the lives of all the sovereigns of Europe put together.

Prior to the little czarevitch's arrival in the summer of 1904 only daughters had been born to the czar and his consort. The little czarevitch was baptized when he was twelve days old, amid great pomp and ceremony. He was dressed in blue and white, we are told, and rode in a gilded carriage drawn by eight horses—the most gorgeous "perambulator" a baby ever had.

The future czar's godfathers were mighty monarchs—his great-grandfather, the late King Christian of Denmark; the German kaiser, King Edward of England, and his uncle, the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia. At the baptismal ceremony the child raised his hand and spread it out as though pronouncing a blessing. Superstitious and ceremonial Russia looked upon it as a good omen, as also the fact that it poured rain after the service. On the day the czarevitch was born the state settled upon him an annual income of $2,000,000 to cover all his expenses until he is fifteen, when a further allowance will be made. Besides this, the czar has transferred to his name foreign stocks which will bring him in yet more.

A general attends him constantly, and he has a body-guard of loyal Cossacks. Learned men have the direction of his education and scientists are engaged to invent instructive toys which will teach him subtle lessons in kingship. But with all this the young czarevitch lives the most harmless, the most simple and plainest of lives surrounded by his family only. We hear only the most contradictory stories of his health, but whatever may have befallen the little czarevitch we know that he has been unable to walk and has been carried about upon the back of a burly Cossack, and is spared fatigue in every way, and no wonder that he is called "The Poor Little Boy."

No wonder the whole Russian people grieve, but it is pleasanter to look at the brighter side—the homes of the czarevitch, for instance. One of them, the winter palace in St. Petersburg, would accommodate 6,000 people and it does house the Russian court of one hundred and seventy-three princes, counts, barons, generals and noblemen. Nothing more splendid can be thought of, even the kitchen is a wonderful place, with its cooking utensils of solid silver and its spice boxes of solid gold. All the china that has belonged to Russian monarchs for ages is here, and is indeed a rare collection.

The children have their schoolrooms and playrooms and the young Prince, Alexis, who is devoted to everything military, has a room he calls his barracks, in which he keeps his toy soldiers and weapons.

Not long ago the president of France, presented the little fellow with a complete camp outfit, tents, furnishings, and all sorts of models of guns and equipment, and he set it up in his military room with great glee. When he visits his father's summer palace, he enjoys a miniature lake, with the craft in models of all nations upon it. It is at this summer home that the czar and his family are able to dine without attendants about. When they finish a course they press a button and the table disappears through the floor and another one rises to take its place, reminding one of an Arabian Night's story.

And then the little czarevitch has a lovely mother. She was a German princess, and her mother was the daughter of the good Queen Victoria of England. But the greatest sorrow that has come to her was in the birth of her son. Four daughters were born to her in succession, while the czar and the rest of the royal family were eagerly wishing for a son to continue the line of the Romanoffs. Finally a son came and the joy which his birth brought was soon darkened, however, for the czarina, by a series of national and inter-national events which made Russia the storm center of the world.

The war with Japan took a disastrous turn just a few weeks before the birth of the heir, and then came the revolution when it seemed each day that the czar might have to abdicate or flee from Russia.

Before the little czarevitch was one year old an attempt was made to assassinate him. Since then attempts have been numerous but little is ever known in regard to them, for each time the seriousness of these injuries is withheld.

But prior to his enforced inactivity of the last year, he took a great deal of interest in all military and naval spectacles and has been present in an "official capacity" in more than one high state function.

But it is common talk in St. Petersburg that Alexis, should he ever grow up into manhood and retain fairly good health, will not be well enough to continue the line of the Romanoffs as emperor.

Many will assure you that his days are numbered and "that Russian statesmen are already planning a scheme for altering the constitution, in order that the male succession may not be imperiled in case the czar and czarina die without another son."

Another report is that the czar is determined to place his daughter Olga on the throne.

The White House Burned By the British in 1814

By Edna May Colman

Copyright, 1914, by Adele Steiner Burleson.

THREE times in a hundred years has the city of Washington witnessed the moving of the Executive Mansion!

Just a hundred years ago the worthy citizens of the straggling village, derisively called the City of Magnificent distances, were listening in fear and trembling for the first sound of the blatant bugles and the triumphant rumble of the guns, which with the rythmic tramp of horsemen should foretell the approach of the conquering British that were daily and hourly expected to swoop down upon the infant capital city, to wipe out its meager populace and reduce its public buildings to smoking ruins.

Despite various timely warnings this disaster overtook the nation with the suddenness of a thunderbolt, for the spirit of the revolution still hovered over the land and the glorious mantle of the illustrious Father of His Country still rested upon the shoulders of American arms, while the marvellous exploits of the intrepid Decatur made the country so secure in its faith in its defenders that no one dreamed that this patriotic pride could suffer such a tremendous fall; when this same soldiery became panic stricken at the first shock and suffered utter and ignominious defeat, for lo,—the Battle of Bladensburg, on August 24th, 1814, was a complete victory for the English forces, who immediately followed up their advantage and marched on to Washington to capture and destroy it.

Many weeks before General Winder had sounded the note of warning to the President and his cabinet in the following words:

"The door of Washington stands wide open and I cannot shut it with the few troops under my command."

So also had the English Admiral boasted that he would dine at the banquet table of Mrs. Madison and make a bow in her drawing-room.

But no one, from the president down to General Winder himself, seemed to possess the characteristics of a military strategist, or to have the courage to make a proper defense, for, before abandoning the city, the secretary of the Navy instructed Commodore Barney to blow up his ships and retreat, so that when the British landed at Benedict about thirty miles from the Capital, they marched for three days, serenely meeting no opposition whatever and at Marlboro, the flotilla of gun boats were blown up at their approach. Commodore Barney's marines retreated to join Winder's and they alone, gave a good account of themselves at the battle, but they were vastly outnumbered, as the infantry gave way at the first onslaught of the enemy, and following the example of the commander-in-chief and other leaders, scurried out of danger.

Judge Cranch, an eye witness of the invasion of Washington, described the event as follows:

"A wound has been inflicted which age will not cure; and a scar has been left which time will scarcely efface."

With the news of the defeat, and the sound of the battle in their ears, the onrush of fleeing men and women, half crazed with flight grew apace, and none had thought to make a stand to save their homes. Of the pitiful 8,000 people that made up the city's populace all but a tenth fled.

Mrs. Madison felt bitterly the desertion of friends and the animosity toward her husband which was growing upon every side and while she watched and waited in the Executive Mansion for the return of the President and his friends for whom a dinner party had been planned for the afternoon, she penned the following letter to her sister which reflects the horror and anguish she endured as well as her bravery. This letter has found its way into the works of many of the early writers.

Tuesday, August 23, 1814.

"Dear Sister:

"My husband left me yesterday morning to join General Winder. He inquired anxiously whether I had courage and firmness to remain in the Presidential House until his return and on my assurances that I had no fear but for him and the success of our army, he left me beseeching me to take care of myself and the cabinet papers, public and private.

"I have since received two dispatches from him written in pencil, the last is alarming, because he desires that I shall be ready at a moment's warning to enter my carriage and leave the city, that the enemy seemed stronger than had been reported, and that it might happen that they would reach the city with the intention to destroy it. * * * * I am accordingly ready. I have pressed as many cabinet papers into trunks as to fill one carriage. Our private property must be sacrificed, as it is impossible to procure wagons for its transportation. I am determined not to go myself until I see Mr. Madison safe and he can accompany me, as I hear of much hostility towards him. * * * *Disaffection stalks around us. * * * * * * * My friends are all gone; even Col. C. with his hundred men who were stationed as a guard over this inclosure. French John (a faithful domestic) with his usual activity and resolution offers to spike the cannon at the gate, and to lay a train of powder which would blow up the British should they enter the house. To this last proposition I positively object, without, however being able to make him understand why all advantages in war may not be taken.

"Wednesday morning, Twelve o'clock.

Since sunrise I have been turning my spy-glass in every direction and watching with unwearied anxiety, hoping to discern the approach of my dear husband and his friends; but alas! I can descry only groups of military wandering in all directions as if there was a lack of arms or spirit to fight for their own firesides!

"Three o'clock:

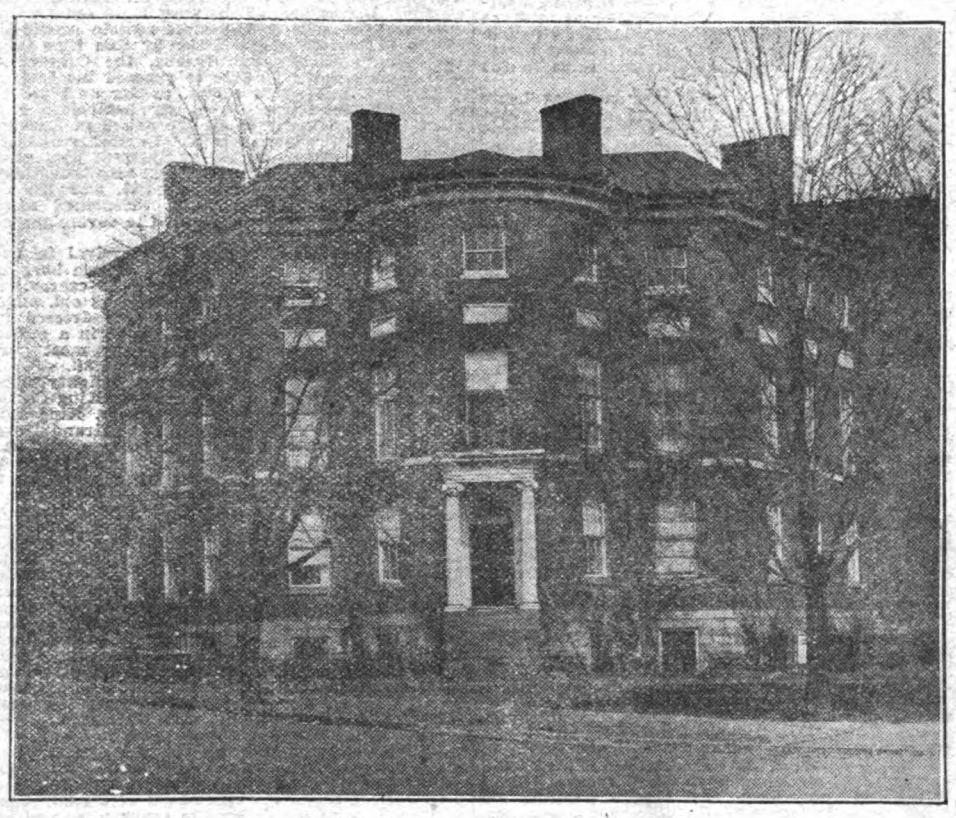
Will you believe it, my sister, we have had a battle or skirmish near Bladensburg and I am still here within sound of the cannon.

Mr. Madison comes not. May God protect him!

"Two messengers covered with dust come to bid me fly, but I wait for him. * * * * At this late hour a wagon has been procured. I have had it filled with the plate and most valuable portable articles belonging to the house. Whether it will reach its destination, the Bank of Maryland or fall into the hands of the British soldiery events must determine.

Our kind friend, Mr. Carroll (Daniel Carroll) has come to hasten my departure and is in a very bad humor with me, because I insist on waiting till the large portrait of General Washington is secured, and it requires to be unscrewed from the wall. This process we found too tedious for these perilous moments so I have ordered the frame broken and the canvas taken out. It is done and the precious portrait in the hands of two gentlemen from New York for safe keeping.

"And now, dear sister, I must leave this house or the retreating army will make me a prisoner by filling up the road I am directed to take. When I shall write again to you or where I shall be tomorrow I cannot tell."



The portrait and the wagon load of portable articles was at the last given over to the care of French John, the doorkeeper of the Mansion and Magrau the gardener who took them to a house near Georgetown.

Mrs. Madison's departure was made only in company with her servant girl and Mr. Daniel Carroll who escorted them to a tavern two or three miles over the river where upon learning that this house was overflowing with fugitives, Mrs. Madison went to another place and called in and went up-stairs. The woman upon learning her identity immediately ordered her in insulting terms to leave at once, which she did, seeking shelter a few miles further on.

At daybreak the little party set out again to meet the President at the place agreed upon and after traveling many weary hours through the intense heat they finally reached the tavern only to meet a most unfriendly reception. The landlord and a large party of Washingtonians, many of whom had partaken of the hospitality of Mrs. Madison and received favors at her hands, determined to refuse her shelter to show their disapproval of her husband's course with regard to the war. Here, the first lady of the land had to appeal for admittance and submit to the insults of former friends, because she was loathe to leave the place, fearing to miss her husband. Finally she was admitted, just in time to escape the wild fury of one of the worst electrical storms the country had ever known. Toward night the weary President arrived and had scarcely settled down to rest when a messenger brought word that his biding place was known to the British and that they were on their way to capture him, whereupon he at once escaped and hid in the woods, intending to make his way to the Virginia shore of the river.

Mrs. Madison in disguise set out again early in the morning to join her husband, and on the road met another messenger bringing word that through their fright at the tornado, the like of which they had never seen and the rumors of the approach of a large force of Americans, the British after ransacking the President's house and feasting upon the good things in the larder set fire to the building and beat a hasty retreat to their boats, burning all public buildings as they went.

With the good news of their evacuation of the city, Mrs. Madison started on her twenty-mile journey to Washington and upon reaching the Long Bridge found it burned at both ends, so that in order to get across she had to abandon her disguise to induce the boatman to admit her to his ferry.

Returning forty-eight hours after her hurried flight she found the Presidential House a smoldering ruin and had to go to her sister's home for a temporary residence. All of the city suffered at the hands of the invaders. One authority in describing these perilous times says that only houses showing barred doors and shuttered windows were fired.

One of the traditions of the day claims that Admiral Cockburn entering the halls of Congress, sprang into the speaker's chair and shouted, "Shall this harbor of Yankee Democracy be burned? All for it will say 'Ay.' The Ays have it. Light up." Thus the Capital was given over to the flames, and through the streets, the wrecked and burning homes looked as though fire and lightning might have played a game of tag in a mad orgy of destruction. The office of the National Intelligencer received special vengeance at the hands of the raiders.

Though many offers of residence were made to the President and his wife, they preferred to rent an establishment for themselves and of the few pretentious houses left unharmed, none seemed so suitable or well adapted for their needs as the beautiful Tayloe Mansion, called the Octagon House at 18th and New York Avenue. This was by far the most elegant private residence in the city. It had been built by Col. John Tayloe, as a winter home through the advice of General Washington, who used his privilege as an old and intimate friend to overrule the decision to erect a winter home in Philadelphia. The house was begun in 1796 and was completed in 1800, with the distinguished Dr. Edward Thornton, the architect of the Capital as the designer.

Col. Tayloe came of distinguished lineage. His grandfather, William Tayloe, emigrated from London to Virginia in 1650 and John Tayloe, his son, a member of the House of Burgesses, founded the noted estate of Mt. Airy, Virginia. He had twelve children, one of whom, John, commissioned by Washington in the Revolutionary War, built the Octagon House, so named for its shape.

The Tayloes intermarried with most of the prominent families of Maryland and Virginia. Col. Tayloe's mother was the daughter of Governor Plater of Maryland and his wife, the daughter of Governor Ogle, also of ryland.

Col. Tayloe was a wealthy man according to the standards of his day, for at the time he built the Octagon, he was enjoying a yearly income of $75,000. His house was most substantially built, being of imported brick trimmed with Aquia Creek sandstone with mahogany woodwork which is today in excellent preservation. Being a famous turfman, his kitchen, quarters and stables were constructed to accommodate a large number of servants and racing horses.

Here, the popular Dolly Madison established her home and held magnificent court, dispensing the same type of lavish hospitality as had been the rule under the rule of the Tayloe family. All of the names famous in the annals of the nation of that period resounded through the splendidly proportioned rooms and floated up to the eyes above the spiral stairway around whose windings so many tales of tragedy and romance have been woven.

This house, today, is in far better condition than many of less than half its age. It stands upon a triangular lot fenced in by a high brick wall, and has the pillared portico of old Colonial style.

The interior is a marvel of fine workmanship. The doors of the first floor are of mahogany and all of the work in the circular vestibule coincides with the circumference of the tower; the doors, sash, glass being made on the circle and all are in perfect working order. The drawing-room mantel is made of a fine cement painted white still showing a faint tracery of gold leaf. Leading back into the dining-room are two secret doors, in which the wash-boards and chair-boards, etc., run across the doors, being ingeniously cut some distance from the actual doors. No keyholes, hinges or openings show on the blind side. The knobs, shutter buttons are of brass and evidently of a special pattern. Two old cast-iron wood stoves still stand in the niches prepared for them in the vestibule, and one has only to close the eyes to see in imagination the elegant, powdered and bewigged and beruffled procession of old-time celebrities, warming their frosty fingers over these quaint old sentinels of a past grandeur. One can picture the buxom Dolly toasting her numb toes in the costly gold-and-silver slippers, one of her many Parisian vanities, in the genial warmth of these ugly little stoves, then the greatest innovation of the age and only to be found in the homes of the wealthy.

All of the rooms surround the circular central hall and all connect some by concealed doors and secret closets. Egress to the street was provided through the dining-room by means of a secret door into a closet and out to the sidewalk, or roadway as it was then, by a basement window. Unexpected closets, secret doors, subterranean passages leading in two different directions, cellars and sub-cellars have all added to the wierd history of the handsome old place which lost its festivity and well kept prosperity with the death of Col. Tayloe in 1828 and gradually became saddled with such a shivery reputation of ghostly occupancy that no one would or could live in it any length of time. Later on, some sisters of charity tried to dispel the ghostly visitors by sprinkling holy water liberally over the entire building, but this did not avail. During the Civil War it was used as a storehouse for records and documents and from time to time has had a variety of tenants, none of whom lingered very long until the American Institute of Architects bought the property and converted the second floor into offices.

Through their interest in preserving the history and traditions of the place, the visitor may wander through the various rooms and stand in hushed reverence in the second story circular room, where President Madison's cabinet gathered around the same old mahogany table that is still in place and upon which the Treaty of Ghent was signed Dec. 14, 1814.

One may peep in Mrs. Madison's bedroom and boudoir while fancy takes a flight that bridges the years and brings a faint perfume and a fleeting vision of the charming chatalaine of a century gone, before her dressing table, deftly adjusting her famous turbans, and skillfully touching up her smooth cheeks with Paris rouge. One may likewise hear the snap of the silver snuff box, the rustle of her voluminous silken garments, and the click of her heels as the spirit of the past carries the enchanted visitor down the broad stairway into the drawing-room to listen to the merry chatter and the shuffle of the cards as the maids and matrons assemble for the games of Loo or perchance 'tis the measured tread of Beaux and lady in the stately minuet, so pregnant is the place with the atmosphere of the past.

Today, the old Octagon stands a monument to the old-time integrity of workman and material, its walls and floors unharmed by the touch of time, and its memories of romance and history as vivid as if only months instead of a century had rolled over its vine-covered face and effaced most of the pristine beauty of the old-fashioned box-bordered walks and flower beds. And another century may roll up its records of lives and events, and fill up its pages with the romance, history and tragedies of other celebrities of the nation and once more the hand of time may check off the landmarks and the Octagon, may be, no doubt will be found, standing solid and serene, basking in the mellow sunlight of a sound, ripe old age, the like of which, belongs to the generation of its builders.

Within a few weeks the burning of Washington was avenged by the death of the invading commander, the American victory at Baltimore, which gave birth to the Star Spangled Banner, the defeat of the British at Plattsburg and the surrender of the fleet on Lake Champlain.

At the Octagon House, peace was celebrated by a series of joyful assemblies and fetes. In the universal rejoicing all parties buried their animosities and the blunders of the President and his cabinet were forgotten. There, the "Peace Winter" was the gayest for many years.

With all of the facilities and advantages of the Tayloe House, the Madisons did not remain there more than a year, moving to a smaller and newer brick building on the corner of 19th and Pennsylvania Avenue which is best known to history as one of the Seven Buildings, built by Elbridge Gerry of Boston. Though considered a most elegant residence it was located on the outskirts of the city, but still only about four blocks from the burned Executive Mansion.

Here, though weary of the exactions of official life, Mrs. Madison continued to live up to and even surpassed her regime of the Octagon. Her ideal of hospitality made the nation's guests her guests and her table was frequently compared to a harvest home supper in its abundance and variety. Her wagon made daily trips to the Georgetown Market, and often the supplies for one day cost fifty dollars.

While residing in the Gerry House President and Mrs. Madison gave the famous levee in honor of General Jackson whose brilliant victory at New Orleans had set the country wild with joy. This house remains but little changed from its original appearance, except that its first floor now accommodates a drug-store and a tailor shop and its color has been changed to a dull yellow. In point of preservation it compares favorably with the Octagon and is another lasting testimonial of the substantial workmanship of the artizans of a hundred years and more ago.

When Virginia once more scored over her sister states in sending another son into the Presidency, in James Monroe, the new President's house was as yet unfinished, and the Monroes solved the problem of a residence by taking possession of the one the Madisons were leaving, and conferred upon this quaint old structure the added prestige of being the abiding place of two presidents.

To the social distinction it had already acquired under the queenly Mrs. Madison was added that given it under the rule of Mrs. Monroe, said to be the most stately lady ever to fill that position. British born, was Mrs. Monroe, daughter of a wealthy English army officer who took up his residence in New York, becoming head of the chamber of commerce there. To the father and sisters Elizabeth Cortright degraded herself and her family in her marriage to the rather obscure young Virginia lawyer as it had nothing but romance to recommend it. However, later years placed her far above her relatives in position. Right royally she assisted her husband in the discharge of his ambassadorial duties at the court of France. There her popularity with the French people gained her the title of "La Belle Americaine." When Madame de Lafayette was imprisoned in the Bastile and expecting execution, the visit to her of Mrs. Monroe produced such an impression upon the authorities that the French lady was liberated soon after her friend's departure.

Upon assuming the duties of First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Monroe sought to restore the formality of the Washingtons to her drawing-rooms, and was exacting as to the people admitted and the costumes worn to her functions. No one was ushered into her presence without the proper credentials and attired in the small clothes, silk hose, etc., the court dress of the times. She never returned calls, and imbued with the ideas prevalent at foreign courts, her levees were the extreme of formal ceremony. To illuminate her drawing-room according to her taste she spent a hundred dollars per night on wax lights alone and her refreshments and service displayed her foreign culture.

Mrs. Monroe watched the completion of the new Executive Mansion with great interest and anticipation as she was to have the honor of enjoying all of its new beauty. She made many trips of inspection and upon one occasion had some of the larger pieces of the broken mirrors, of which there were quantities in the debris gathered up and made into small hand mirrors then so useful to the dressing table of the period. One of these may be seen in the National Museum in the case with one of the costumes of that administration.

As the vengeance of the British left nothing of the President's palace but the blackened walls, these were painted white to conceal the fire stains and then the exterior was made white to correspond, to which fact the building owes the name, White House. To preserve the unity of the name and the condition the building is given a coat of white paint each year. Though entirely rebuilt no change was made in the original plan and when finished it stood forth once more to the adoring gaze of the nation a duplicate of its original shape and size, which it retained until the Roosevelt Administration.

To the restored White House, Mrs. Monroe brought from the Gerry House her splendid personal collection of rare and beautiful works of art gathered in her foreign travels and in 1820, her younger daughter, Hester Maria had the distinction of being the first daughter of a President to be married there. Her marriage to her cousin,

MRS. WOODROW WILSON

An Inspiring Example of Womanhood

By Edna Mary Colman

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

ONCE more the Grim Reaper has plunged the nation into gloom and sorrow, and great and small, rich and poor are grieving with the President and his family over the death of the gracious First Lady of the Land who had won the hearts of the people, throughout the length and breadth of the country, by her unaffected sweetness and unfailing sympathy toward all in need and suffering.

So widespread was her influence for good, so great her service to humanity, that to the sorrowing citizens of the Capital City, as well as the nation at large, her loss has made a gap that it seems impossible for even time to fill.

Mrs. Wilson was richly endowed with Nature's most gracious gifts. Her many physical attractions but reflected the beauty of mind and lofty purpose to which she devoted her lifetime from girlhood to death—service to others. Hence she was a most unusual woman, great, in the biggest sense of the word for in her make up self formed the smallest part. Her life was a beautifully rounded-out symphony of loving, unselfish effort and harmonious result, and left its impress upon the lives of all with whom she came in contact. The most astonishing characteristic of this woman, upon whom had fallen the nation's greatest honors, was her humility. So unassuming and retiring was she that she thought too little of her own opinions to voice them. When thousands of women hung upon her words, ready to follow her slightest suggestion, she remained silent, preferring to work out the solution to the many problems that confronted her as wife of the President in her own mind and then quietly aid and direct the accomplishment, with no thought of glory to herself. Yet so clear was her insight, and so broad her conception that her husband daily sought her advice and opinion upon the great problems of the nation. He had the profoundest respect and admiration for her sound judgment and perception in all matters of political and national importance.

So strong was the bond of affection and sympathy between the President and his wife that it was an accepted understanding that the support of either one upon any project meant the full approval and endorsement of the other. All through her illness her constant and chief concern was that the President be kept in ignorance of her suffering. Toward the end she put a charge upon Dr. Cary Grayson, saying:

"If I go away, Doctor, promise me you will take care of my husband."

Through all her life, Mrs. Wilson had steadily declined to belong to clubs and organizations that would absorb her time, declaring that she must keep herself free to be ready for her husband and daughters when they needed her, yet she quietly slipped into her place in the White House, and in the full glare of the pitiless limelight that always keeps its brightest rays bent in full strength upon the head of the nation and his family, and assumed all and many more of the burdens and obligations of public life than any president's wife before her had ever attempted to do.

Her social regime was simpler, making up in genuine hospitality and sincere enjoyment whatever it may have lacked of the glitter and brilliance of former administrations. Each individual came away from her receptions with a warm glow of satisfaction, because of her charming personal greeting. Never did she look bored, even when toward the last just before her illness began, she was obliged to sit down. Generations of gentle ancestry bequeathed a courtesy that was as much a part of her as her soft wavy brown hair and expressive dark eyes.

Her thoughtful consideration of her husband's welfare had become a sort of second nature with her and to spare him a little extra fatigue and exertion she received many delegations for him so that he might give the time to the more weighty matters of state. In the same spirit of thoughtfulness for others, during his illness less than a year ago she shook hands and gave a kindly word of greeting to each one of the one thousand Corn Club boys and girls of Ohio who were in Washington last fall.

The little band of eight Eagle Boy Scouts will treasure their Eagle badges with greater pride in the memory of the queenly lady who so warmly praised them as she carefully pinned the prized trophy to each khaki covered breast.

As the daughter of a Presbyterian Minister, Mrs. Wilson was always active in church and philanthropic work in her girlhood and so she continued her church interests and activities all through the busy years that followed.

When she first came to Washington, she became interested in the work of the Woman's Department of the National Civic Federation, the District Branch of which with Mrs. Archibald Hopkins was busily working to clean up the alleys and eliminate the slums. The pitiful condition of many of the old colored people living in poverty and squalor had a peculiar appeal to her, because of her Southern birth and the care which the old families of the South bestow upon their "old mammies". The condition of the children tugged at her sympathies, too.

Mrs. Wilson not only attended the meetings of the District Branch of the Federation but she made any number of personal tours of inspection through some of the worst of the city's alleys and slums and partly as a result of the interest she manifested, a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives for the Reclamation of such pest spots. Though it was discussed at great length no action was taken upon this bill until the day of Mrs. Wilson's death. The night before she recalled her interest in the alleys and slums and mentioned to the President that it would give her much happiness if the pending bill could be passed. The morning after, the President spoke to Mr. Tumulty about the matter and asked that something be done about the bill if possible. Mr. Tumulty thereupon discussed the bill with Secretary Bryan, several Senators and Representative Johnson, chairman of the House District Committee, who called an executive session of his committee, where it was decided to report the bill favorably at once and to make every possible effort to have it passed as soon as possible. All of the members of the committee knew of the bill and many of them had accompanied the various parties which Mrs. Wilson had gotten together to go through the alleys. The alley bill passed the Senate unanimously and the fact was made known to Mrs. Wilson during a period of consciousness about two hours before she died. Though the bill passed by the Senate and the one reported favorably by the House District Committee are unlike their purposes are the same. The hurried adjournment of Congress owing to Mrs. Wilson's death prevented the bill being brought up in the House at that time, but undoubtedly that body will approve the measure that will bring about the reforms Mrs. Wilson longed to see prevail in the Capital City.

To the people of Washington and no less to the people of the country each one of whom has, or should have, a deep interest in the Capital of the nation, the alley bill is of great importance. It provides for a gradual emptying of about 11,000 inhabitants out of 268 alleys, thus removing root and branch the most unwholesome centers of disease, vice and crime which the city contains. How or why alleys came about as living places for humanity are questions too remote to go into, the fact remains that they should be closed to habitation. They are winding intricate passages hidden from view of the street, sometimes housing between two and three hundred people, breeding places for moral and physical ills that disgrace the name of Washington. One half of the children born to colored mothers in the alleys are illegitimate, many of these are born to girls from thirteen to eighteen. Communicable diseases prevail to a greater extent within the alleys and the alley death rate is nearly twice as great as that of the street making the general death rate of Washington higher than that of forty-one of the fifty cities of the United States with a population of a hundred thousand or more. Even New York with her congested population has a death rate far below that of the beautiful Capital City. One of Mrs. Wilson's earliest expeditions was to Goat Alley, considered the worst of its kind in the city. She was accompanied by Mrs. E. P. Bicknell, chairman of the committee on housing of the National Civic Federation and two secret service men. She traversed the entire length of the alley on foot and was so impressed by the conditions she found there that she accepted the position of honorary chairman of the advisory board of the housing committee, in order to help actively with the clean-up work. Mrs. Wilson never indorsed any cause simply by letting her name be used, so in the duties of honorary chairman, she worked as energetically as the rest of the members of the committee. This was only one of many, many trips this earnest woman made through the dirty and dismal byways of the city. Never did she manifest the aversion and disgust she must have felt, nor did she show any aloofness, but went as any serious-minded, interested woman would who sought to see conditions for herself and the way to better them. She stopped repeatedly to talk to the children and their parents and though her comments to her companions were few they were always pertinent. There are scores of poor alley dwellers who will always treasure the wonder of the moment, when the gentle First Lady of the Land stepped down from her splendid limousine and walked through their midst, with a pleasant word and a friendly handshake for any and all who greeted her. True, time and time again, she went home with her dainty gloves stained and grimy, but that was the least of her concern for she loved to do things to help people, that was her idea of life and her religion.

MRS. WOODROW WILSON.

At one of the meetings of the federation a newspaper woman asked her to say a few words for publication about her interest in the alley clean-up work or any of the other many lines of reform for which she was working. She replied with her usual courteous manner that she had found it best never to permit herself to be quoted and that of course she could not make any statement regarding it, but she added earnestly, "You can see that my whole heart is in this work." As proof of her interest that very morning she brought a letter from the President to Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, head of the District Branch of the National Civic Federation, and which was read to assembled wives of Senators and Representatives, expressing his heartiest indorsement and cooperation with the plans of the workers in this movement.

In blotting the alley from existence in the Capital, the tumble-down shacks were to be demolished, many of the alleys turned into playgrounds and parks, others were planned to be used for the erection of garages and stables while in some Mrs. Wilson wished to see the establishment of modern sanitary, community wash houses where laundresses, for a few pennies might take their piles of soiled linen and wash and iron them under sanitary conditions. One of these laundries, was put in operation just a short time ago and here young girls and women who wish to learn are taught to wash clothes clean and to starch and iron them properly. This sanitary laundry was one of the projects that had Mrs. Wilson's deepest interest and she contributed her time and money to further its advancement.

She also was a frequent visitor to the library of the blind where her daughter, Miss Margaret, has frequently sung.

Early in her regime as Chatalaine of the White House she began investigating the sanitary conditions of the various big government departments. Through the long corridors and winding passageways and in and out of the big rooms, she went with always a pleasant word and handshake for such of the employees as evinced a desire to speak to her. Quietly and without any advance notice she would appear and though she said but little, nothing escaped her. Mrs. John MacLaughlin, called the fairy godmother to the department clerks because of her tireless work in their behalf for several years, piloted Mrs. Wilson through the various buildings and through her interest, all of the departments now have rest rooms, sanitary drinking cups, and little branch hospitals where first aid may be given in case of actual illness or accident of any kind. The Bureau of Printing and Engraving received one of Mrs. Wilson's first visits and all suggestions made by her were most gladly received and cheerfully carried out, with the result that their new building has one of the finest, best equipped, rest and lunch rooms for its employees of any in the country. Just a few days before her death, Mrs. Wilson received a letter from Public Printer Ford of the Government Printing office expressive of the appreciation of himself and the 1700 women who work there for her efforts in securing a rest room for them so that those employed on the per diem basis, if taken suddenly ill might lie down for a few minutes and then perhaps go back to work, whereas before if ill, they would have to go home and lose their pay and the government lose their work. A corridor was converted into this grateful comfort spot by the erection of a simple partition and the addition of a few chairs and couches.

Among some of the other reforms and improvement projects for the Capital city for which Mrs. Wilson gave her time and energy were as follows:

Sufficient visitorial and inspection corps for enforcement of school attendance laws, regulation of child labor, supervision of dependent and neglected children, sanitation and municipal tuberculosis and school nurses.

Sufficiently organized and adequate agencies to supply tee need for a modern municipal hospital, a municipal lodging house, a juvenile court building, provision for the care of the feeble minded, provision for the treatment of drug victims, a parental school, open-air schools, playgrounds and recreation centers, public comfort stations, public baths and wash houses; legislation to promote the use of school buildings as social recreation centers, establishment of a social welfare department, the compulsory removal of careless and dangerous tuberculosis patients, a revised child labor law, a revised school attendance law, amendment of the loan law, improved procedure for the commitment of the insane and the adoption of the indeterminate sentence law.

Besides all of these various weighty matters she lent her name and gave as freely as she could of her time and support to the Southern Commercial Congress, and the Southern Educational Association.

Being of the South she was naturally interested in every practical progressive movement that related to that section and the indorsement she gave to the work of the Southern mountaineer women, was the greatest benefit that could befall them. Like all people with any self respect these women did not want charity, they only wanted an opportunity to show their beautiful, old-fashioned hand-made rugs, carpets, curtains, counterpanes, etc., to people who would be interested to buy them. Mrs. Wilson graciously allowed them to fit up a room in the White House with their handiwork, and she exploited it by telling her friends and having the women of Congress and the Cabinet come to tea and inspect the exhibit and talk to the weavers themselves. The result was order after order for the quaint work from the toil-worn hands of these women who have preserved a lost art, in the remote fastnesses of their mountain homes, and to whom the chance to sell their work for real money, not trade it off for supplies, was the greatest boon the President's wife could confer. Moreover, when each of her daughters was married, numerous pieces of this old-fashioned industry were purchased by their mother and included in her gifts to them.

To the poorhouse she constantly sent flowers from the White House. Never before did the poor of Washington receive so liberally of the floral beauties of the White House conservatories. Hospitals and orphan asylums were always remembered, and to the little newsboys of the street she was "an angel" for she would buy their papers and laugh away the return change. So great was their love for her that they took up a collection among themselves and bought a floral offering for her casket.

Mrs. Wilson chose to do her good works after the biblical injunction to not let the right hand know what the left had done, so that her private charities, are known but to a few. In addition to her own activities for the betterment of mankind must be added the various projects that occupied her daughters' attention, for this family was united and harmonious and these girls were reared to adore their father, and all of their interests and activities had the sanction and support of their parents, so that behind the Lighthouse work, the Philadelphia settlement work of Mrs. Sayre, and the welfare labor of Miss Margaret and Mrs. MacAdoo there was always the sympathetic interest and guidance of their mother, both in Washington as well as in Princeton.

Many a struggling artist and ambitious musician have cause to remember Mrs. Wilson with gratitude for the opportunities she made possible for them to show what they could do and thus get a start up the ladder of success.

Said one woman of her: "Even her servants love her and it is a great thing to have your servants' esteem."

Mrs. Wilson started her married life with the genius of a home maker, though an artist of marked ability. Her paintings reflect her ideals for they portray mostly the serenity of nature. It would seem as though tranquility of temperament was the secret of the charm this woman exercised upon her surroundings for she seemed to have moved through life in tune with her environment, having a faculty for casting aside trouble and the graceful ease of a reposeful nature that radiated comfort and serenity and peace in her home and the tact that instantly put guests at ease and won admiration from the most critical.

Her death coming so unexpectedly, was such a shock as Washington has not felt for years. When the big iron gates were closed and locked, the shades were drawn and the somber emblem of death hung from the door of the White House as if it were a simple private dwelling, the whole city responded to the grief within, and lowered its flags, stopped its merry makings and frolics and hushed its voices into low murmurs in reverence to the gentle lady who left them a legacy, greater than any monument that money or art can produce, a legacy in the legislation that means happier, healthier, better lives for thousands in the years to come.

Telegrams of condolence and sympathy flooded the White House by the thousands, and floral tributes filled the rooms requiring half-a-dozen vans and wagons to remove them. They came from every class and degree of society from the newsboys to the magnificent tributes of foreign governments and from the handsome offering of the Boy Scouts to the simple bouquet of some lowly protege. Yet these are long since faded and dead but Mrs. Wilson's life was so fraught with good works that it is deathless and will continue green in the memory not only of her family and friends but as an example and inspiration to all other women of exalted position to use their talents for the good of mankind.

The White House Burned

Samuel L. Gouverneur, occurred but a week prior to the death of Stephen Decatur, at whose house the young couple had been given a ball but two days previous.

To the Monroes, Lafayette came as the nation's guest accompanied by his son and by them entertained during his stay in the city.

Through the years that followed little was done to the White House until Mr. Roosevelt came into the Presidency, when the building was enlarged by the addition of two wings, the basement utilized, and the attic converted from a storeroom into additional bed, bath and dressing-rooms. The conservatory was removed and the State dining-room enlarged, while the floors were all reinforced and many minor details changed. During this remodelling period, President Roosevelt occupied the house or Jackson place, which was also dubbed Temporary White House, and which, by a coincidence was the one occupied by Monroe when the Madison's cabinet. The stay in the Jackson place house was of but short duration, and it was not in the strict sense a moving, for the White House furnishings were not removed to it and much of the work was done in the summer while the President and his family were at their own home in Oyster Bay.

Foolish Distrust of Banks

"Every child should have a bank account and be taught to make it grow gradually but surely. An intelligently managed bank gives youth its start in life, middle age its competency and old age its comfort and security."—Postmaster General A. S. Burleson.

Very frequently one reads in the newspaper about persons who have lost a large amount of money, perhaps the savings of a lifetime, because they did not have confidence enough in banks to leave their money on deposit there.

They preferred to act as their own bankers and lived to regret their folly.

Here is a summary of a number of recent news items of that nature.

Mammoth Springs, Ark.—When Mrs. Kate Williams sold her home several days ago she stowed the money, $3,000, in a leather satchel and elected to be its guardian. Early in the morning a small band of men rode into Mammoth Springs, robbed the house at which Mrs. Williams was a guest and made off with the satchel.

Jersey City, N. J.—The other night while Nicolo Dambrosia, Nicolo Lucarello and Tony Lucarello slept in their flat in the basement of the tenement house at 123 Myrtle avenue a thief crept in and stole the three pairs of trousers that cover the sturdy limbs of Dambrosia and the brothers Lucarello in the daytime.

But in the trousers of Nicolo Dambrosia snuggled $2,350, and in those of Nicolo Lucarello $650, and yet again in those of Tony Lucarello $410—all sweet American dollars, dug with the pick and the shovel.

Altoona, Pa.—When Thomas Fitzsimmons, an electrical engineer, returned to his home from a night job he found his wife and five children all partly under the influence of chloroform, while the house had been thoroughly searched. Ten hundred dollars had been taken from its hiding place. Having no confidence in banks, Fitzsimmons kept his savings in the house.

Terre Haute, Ind.—Robert Sluscser, a glass blower, put $65 in gold and silver in the bottom of a coal hod and filled the latter with coal to hide the money over night. The next morning he made a fire and dumped coal and coin into the stove. Suddenly he recalled hiding the money and frantically extinguished the fire. The coin was melted into a lump.

South Scranton, Pa.—Fearing to trust his hoard to any of the local banking institutions, Frank Scholski secreted it behind a picture in his home. One day last week during his temporary absence some stranger cleaned out the "bank."

Seattle, Wash.—Mrs. George Shea of Duluth, Minn., who is visiting her sister, Mrs. John English, in a suburb of Seattle, has reported to the police that she has been robbed of $20,000 in currency.

Mrs. Shea's husband, who intended to follow her from Duluth, and buy property here, shipped the money to her by express. She intended to put the money into a bank at once, but for various reasons put it off. When she and her sister decided to visit Seattle they hid the $20,000 between the sheets of a bed. On returning home at night found that burglars had ransacked the house and stolen the treasure.

Multiply these cases by hundreds and thousands every year and you get some idea of the toll paid by foolish persons who do not make full use of the security afforded by the banks.

Betty and the Fairy

By Uncle John

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

BETTY was a little girl ten years of age and lived with her mamma and papa and baby brother on a farm. They were poor people but their home was cozy and comfortable. She was a smart child but selfish and lazy. Her mother had a lot of work to do, as all mothers have, but Betty would not help to do a single thing. At night when she got home from school, instead of starting to peel potatoes or set the table, she would throw her books in a corner and run right out to play. If her baby brother Paul tried to follow her and called out, "Tum bat here oo Betsy," she would run faster so he could not catch up. Once, he got lost but even that did not cure her. Her father worked hard in the field all day and did not know how lazy she was. He believed her to be a good child and loved her very much. Betty's mother never told on her but she was often sad and lonely. One rainy day, after dinner the family group sat in the dining-room, The father was mending a harness, the mother sewing, the baby busy with his toys and Betty, as usual, sat idle. Her mamma had twice asked her to pick up some patches and spools which had fallen out of the work basket but still she did not stir. Noticing how disobedient she was, her father got vexed and said:

"You lazy girl, obey your mother and pick those things up at once."

Betty got down to find the spools, at the same time muttering:

"That's always the way, I have to do all the drudgery."

Her patient mother answered reprovingly:

"Every day you neglect the little chores you should take delight in doing, and I am much worried about what is going to become of you."

"I never knew this before," put in the father, "and if it continues, I am going to ask the fairies to come and take her away and leave us instead a good little girl who will help her mother."

This gave Betty a little scare and that night when she went to bed, she plunged her head under the clothes and kept as still as a mouse, but she did not sleep. She lay awake dreading the little tasks she would have to do to help her mother, and wishing for a life of entire idleness and self-indulgence, for she had the wrong notion that to be busy meant to be unhappy.

Presently she fell to thinking how nice it would be if she were a cat and could sleep and stretch and yawn all day in a warm, sunny spot or huddle up under the stove. This pleased her fancy for a little while but soon she decided that it would be still more pleasant to be a bumble-bee buzzing around lazily among the sweet-smelling flowers. Imagining herself floating dreamily above a garden soon lost its charm and she sought more enticing pleasures.

"Why," she exclaimed, half aloud, "a bee stays too close to the ground and does not travel far enough. What I want to be is a chipmunk with nothing to do but play and climb and bound from tree to tree."

For a half hour, she pondered over this kind of existence in quite a happy mood, but the spell of discontent would not stay away and she found herself endeavoring to think of some creature that had a more care-free life than a chipmunk. At first it was hard and quite stumped her, but of a sudden, she thought of the birds that fly so gaily about.

"They certainly have the finest time of all," she said, and felt vexed that she had not thought of being a bird in the first place. Only half satisfied, she soon began to plan what kind of a bird she would prefer to be.

Before she had made up her mind she felt a touch and peeping from under the clothes, she beheld a sight that at first scared her. At the side of the bed stood a beautiful fairy with a bright, pretty face, a wonderful crown on her head and in her hand, a golden wand. When Betty got a good look at her, strange to say, she was not afraid. The fairy spoke, saying:

"My child, follow me; I will show some wonders. You shall have a taste of the life the wild creatures, which you envy, really lead."

Betty did not try to move, but she felt herself rising out of bed and was surprised to find that she was fully dressed. Right through the side of the house they passed, just as if an open door had been there and, once outside, it seemed to be broad daylight. She felt very queer walking along, because she was not trying to move her feet at all. Up and down they went just by wishing to, and when they landed on the stone walk, they did not make any more noise than a snow-flake does in falling on the water. The first thing Betty saw was a cat, lolling upon their own back porch, and the instant she set eyes on it, it turned into a girl about her own size and stood up, and Betty herself turned into a cat. The fairy had disappeared, but a faint voice was heard saying:

"Now you can find out for yourself, what an easy life a cat leads." Just then her mother came out the door in a hurry to get a pail of water. The door accidentally struck the cat's side; the mother, without meaning to do it, stepped on her tail and spilled cold water on the sleek fur. Betty tried to yell out:

"Mamma, mamma, don't you know me?" But the only voice that came said, "Me-ow-w-w, meo-ow-w." Try as she might, she could not get herself recognized. With much disappointment, she noticed that her fur was black, while their own cat, she recalled, was a gray one. More discouraged than ever at this, she slunk down towards the barn, but imagine her terror, when, without a moment's warning a huge bulldog sprang at her, snarling and growling savagely. With wildly beating heart, she managed to escape by leaping upon a fence. The dog continued to jump and bark at her, but she felt quite safe because she knew that he could not climb. Her safety did not last long however, for two boys who chanced along began to throw stones at her. Scampering away, she took refuge under a shed, but it was damp and dark and anything but pleasant there. Fear was the only thing that made her stay but after what seemed an age, she grew so hungry that she decided it would be as well to venture out and get pelted as to stay there and starve. Cautiously she poked her head out and much to her surprise, saw the pretty fairy standing there.

"Are you contented with being a cat?" came the question.

"Oh, no, no, please save me," cried the unhappy girl, this time her voice sounding quite natural.

"All right Miss Betty Cat," came the answer, "you shall now become Miss Betty Bumblebee."

Instantly the child found that she was a bee, winging its way across a field of clover toward a flower garden. She was with a lot of other bees and they worked, worked, worked, without a second's rest, sucking the honey from the flowers and carrying it back to their home in a hollow tree. You may be sure that lazy Betty did not like this kind of a busy life. If she stopped to rest for an instant, all the other bees would scold and threaten and punish her, and indeed would have killed her if she had not begged for mercy and promised to work constantly like the others. She could not understand how they could work so hard and be so happy, for they seemed very gay and contented indeed. Before the day was over, she was tired and disgusted and decided to fly away by herself. She got her chance by lagging behind the others and set out at great speed across a ploughed lot. A man was stooped over, working, at some distance, and she made for him. When she drew close, she saw, with joy, that it was her father, and tried to fly right into his arms. He seemed angry and a little scared and taking off his hat, struck at her with it, trying his best to crush her life out.

"Oh, papa, dear papa, save me," she tried to say, but the only sound he heard was the "Buzz, bu-z-z-z," of a bee. Much against her will, Betty Bumblebee was forced to fly away, and meeting with the fairy again, she was turned into a chipmunk quicker than a wink. She was able to hop from tree to tree all right, but she was too hungry to think of anything but food. It took a long time and a great amount of climbing and searching to find one good nut, for they were scarce that year. Lots of times, she would be just about to pick one up when some other animal would snatch it from her. Every breeze that stirred the leaves startled her and once a hunter fired a bullet that just grazed her furry coat. There did not seem to be a second's rest or peace. At last she crawled into a small hole in the ground with another chipmunk. It was a long, narrow tunnel with many branches and three entrances, and seemed a very nice, cozy place to reside in while she was in her present form. She was just making up her mind to be contented for a while, when the ground above began to rend and tear and a big, shiny steel dagger came through the roof and nearly struck her. She looked again, in great awe, and saw that it was a plow point that had done the damage. Some farmer plowing his field, had rooted them out and destroyed a home that it would take weeks to build. This was the worst blow of all and as soon as she could crawl out, Betty cried in her real, natural voice:

"Oh, kind fairy, please come back."

"I am here child, or you could not speak with a human voice," came the answer.

"I am very sorry that I hated work so much," sobbed Betty. "I do not want to be a bird. Please change me back to a girl again and I will help mamma take care of my baby brother."

"Very well, if you think you have learned that your own lot is the happiest one for you, so be it," was the response. Betty began to feel around and much to her joy found that she was a girl and better still that she was at home in bed. She rubbed her eyes and sat up and tried to learn whether or not she had been dreaming or had really been in fairy land. Try as she might, she could not solve the riddle. Of one thing she was certain; it was broad daylight, so she got up and dressed, and after tidying up her room began to help her mother set the table. A happy smile came to her mamma's face and she hugged Betty tight and gave her a big kiss, saying with glad tears in her eyes:

"My, what a good change has come over my little girl."

Every little help she did that day made her feel gayer, so at last Betty had learned that the way to keep happy is to be unselfish.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

GRADY, N. MEX.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

May I come in and chat a while with you? I am a cripple and if I did not have so much to do, would get very lonesome away out on these prairies. We live on the great plains. The days are warm and nights cool. I enjoy reading the sisters' letters very much, particularly Mrs. Wusson's letter about adopting a grandma. If I were strong I, too, would like to adopt a grandma. I have always loved old folks and some of my dearest friends are old ladies. I dearly love babies, too. I have been married five years to a good "Tommy." One little baby came to brighten our home, but God in His infinite wisdom saw best to take him home to Himself. Oh, how hard it was to give our darling up. I find Mrs. Leupp's "mite" the greatest comfort. It is a great thing to know and love Jesus, for He is a comforter indeed. I wish the whole world knew Him.

Mrs. Barnes. You voiced my sentiment exactly in regard to the poor girls that go astray. If we would let them know we love them and try in Jesus' name to help them to a higher plane of life, there would not be so many of them think that no one cares for them and it does not make any difference how they live. I think the world is dying for "a little bit of love."

I am twenty-six years old, five feet, two inches tall and weigh seventy-eight pounds. Have black hair and brown eyes.

Now for the hints:

When anything sticks to pots or pans while cooking, wet pan and turn bottom up in a pan of warm water and let stand a minute or two. It will then be easily washed.

For the blues, Jesus said: "These things have I spoken unto you, that in me you might have peace: in the world ye shall have tribulation. Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world."

I was Gusie Battles before I married. If any of my old friends see this I would be glad to hear from them, also from any of the sisters that care to write me.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters,
Your COMFORT sister, MRS. T. B. CHRISTIAN.

PITTSBURG, KANS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Here comes a girl from the Sunflower state.

This is not a very good farming country. We have lived on the farm five years and the crops have been a failure every year. This year they need rain and if we do not get it there will be no crops.

This is a very pretty place. Almost all kinds of grain, vegetables and fruit are raised; that is, in a good year. We live in the coal mining districts for coal is mined all around our place. Land is worth from fifty to one hundred dollars an acre. We live seven miles from the air line and two miles from the railroad and we can go to town almost any time.

Pittsburg is the largest industrial city in Kansas, with commission form of government, municipal owned water works, unexcelled educational facilities, magnificent churches and a fifteen thousand dollar Y. M. C. A.; seven million tons of coal mined annually, valued at twelve million dollars; eleven thousand men employed in mines; many manufacturing industries, five banks as solid as Gibraltar, over three million dollars deposits, beautiful parks and seven miles of paved street and one hundred and fifty miles Inter-urban railway. Population twenty-one thousand; our large Manual Training Normal School burned down about a month ago. They are now rebuilding it.

I have lived in Pittsburg all the time till the last five years.

I hope this will benefit some of the sisters that are thinking of coming to this part of Kansas.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters in different places as we are thinking of moving to a different state; will answer all letters I receive.

I will describe myself before I close, I am seventeen years old, light complexion, light hair, hazel eyes; and weigh about ninety-eight pounds.

Trusting you will all live long and happily is the wish of MISS BERTHA LENSKI.

SPARTANBURG, S. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have often thought I would write to our circle in the dear old COMFORT, but kept putting it off till I read the letter from Grandma where you asked for the opinion of other mothers. I shall endeavor to give mine from experience with my own children, and from observing some of my neighbors and friends. I am the proud mother of six children, four girls and two boys. One of my girls was taken home when she was four years old, there to await my coming, but I still have four girls for I have my dead sister's only child who is as dear to our circle as if she were our very own. When my children were babies I taught them that when I told them to do a thing I meant for them to obey, and at once without comments of any kind. Sometimes after they grew larger they willfully disobeyed me and I did as that wise old man, Solomon, said to do, else spoil the child. Even yet with my baby, nine years old, I have to be emphatic as well as with the others. I have never had to use corporal punishment more than a few times with each child but they know quite well to obey. I want to say that I never saw children, from the eldest to the youngest more devoted to their mother, they never grow weary doing little kindnesses for me, all of them are so affectionate and sympathetic that my neighbors and friends say they are splendid children. I have been observing some of the mental persuasion children and to tell the truth I would be glad to have the control of them for a few days and then I feel safe in saying they would know more things about obeying their mothers.

I can't help but feel sad when I think of how the poor mother will see her mistake when she has to send her young girl to a house of correction, and see her boy go down to the depths of degradation through her own mistake in training them while small.

Don't think that I believe a baby should be spanked for his little errors, far from such, but there is a way to make them understand what you want them to do, that is to tell them and see they do as you wish them to do, and always be truthful and honest with them. Never make promises you can't fulfill. Above everything, seek Divine guidance from our Lord, ask Him to teach you how to deal with each child so that they may be of service for Him. I have never seen a child that I could not manage and have them love me. You know love begets love. I am fond of children and they soon find that out. Right now I can in my mind see the faces of two dear little tots when they see me. One will say: "Hello Tom," the other one "Hello Ganley," meaning "Gramy" the name his mother taught him to call me. Some day should we be so fortunate as to have any real grandchildren I shall try to persuade their mother to rear them as I have mine.

I can't close this lengthy letter without telling that COMFORT is a great comfort, especially the Sisters' Corner; you are doing a noble work, one that will live long after you have gone to your reward.

Cordially yours, MRS. CHAS. D. THOMPSON.

Mrs. Thompson. You are the first mother to respond to my request for opinions, but I hope to hear from many others. Here is an opportunity for the moral suasion mothers to give us their ideas and experiences. So much depends on the early training of children that we cannot be too careful. It is not always wise to follow the same line of government with all children, even in the same family, for often their natures are entirely different, and the best way can only be determined by careful and watchful care.—Ed.

Browning Ave., IGNACIO, COLO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I hope the few ideas I send enclosed herewith will be of benefit to the large sisterhood who use the columns of COMFORT to their mutual advantage.

I wonder if any of the sisters would enjoy discussing through these columns, books they have found profitable? I read a great deal and try to select good helpful books and have accumulated quite a small library.

This is a new town of a few stores, a schoolhouse, two hotels and nearly two dozen residences. Aside from the few merchants and some carpenters and other laborers, most of the population are owners of or workers on nearby ranches. There is considerable excitement around here now owing to the reported find of good minerals a few miles distant, this being the nearest railroad station thereto. A short distance from Ignacio is an agency of the government and a school for the Indians, and a great deal of land adjacent to here is owned by Indians.

Another lady and myself are trying to cooperate with the Bishop of western Colorado to erect, furnish and maintain a small Episcopal church here. I would be glad if some of the sisters would suggest ideas for us to follow up in having a bazaar, making articles therefor, or any way by which we can raise funds for the furtherance of this work for the moral uplifting of the community. There is a surprising number of unbelievers here, with their immoral infection. Someone suggested our trying to help by the use of the chainless prayer method, but Uncle Charlie has influenced me against that scheme.

The Indians and whites together are going to have a fair here, comprising exhibits and entertainments.

My husband has been a subscriber of COMFORT for many years and I have gained a great deal of help from its perusal, and have saved many, many clippings from it.

How many of the sisters like aluminum cooking utensils? They are so new that it is questionable whether they are an improvement over other kinds or not,—some acquaintances praise them and others do not.

Almost all of the ladies around here ride horseback, and all but a few ride astride.

In addition to the whites and Indians here, we have a large number of Mexicans, so that the population is very mixed. Many of the Indian women (squaws) carry their infants (papooses) on their backs.

To a dweller in an old, large city, it is quite unique to see a town grow up where but a few years ago there was only a smooth uninhabited stretch of land.

This town is on the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad and the track is narrow gauge over the Rocky Mountains, and travelers from the far eastern states seem to regard the engine and coaches as rather a toy affair. We are about sixteen hundred feet above sea level.

One particular localism is that the majority here speak of anywhere east of the Rocky mountains as "Back East," so that when you hear of things back east, that may mean in Iowa, Kansas, Missouri or Oklahoma, or Indiana.

Living is expensive here, owing to the very high rate on freight over the mountains, and also, because there are no nearby manufacturing points, everything except grain, hay and the staple vegetables and fruits, have to be brought in.

I could write much more but my letter is probably too long now, so, wishing you and all the sisters much success and happiness, I am, Yours very sincerely.

MRS. ABBY SCHILLER.

Mrs. Schiller. Would it be asking too much for you to write us again, giving a list of the books you have found helpful and also tell us of the success you meet with in your church work, for I feel sure you will be successful. When one's time is limited they should use care in selecting their reading matter, so as to make the most of every minute.—Ed.

1215 Malvern Ave., HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wonder if a sister from the greatest health and pleasure resort in the world will be welcome in your happy circle?

Isn't it grand to be a member of this bright, helpful family whose rays extend from coast to coast? What a big reunion there would be if we could find a place large enough to accommodate "our family!"

If I am not intruding would like to tell you about this wonderful little resort. Thousands come here annually to bathe in these famous natural hot waters, and "go on their way rejoicing." There are forty-four springs with an average temperature of 135 degrees Fahrenheit, the hottest being 157. One can hardly hold a cup while drinking. They discharge about 800,000 gallons a day, and are all located on the United States Reservation. The waters are radio-active in a marked degree and to the presence of this element in gaseous form is now generally attributed their salutary effects. The United States Government made a reservation of the springs and surrounding country and took possession of them in 1832 setting them apart as a National Park and Sanitarium for all time. We have twenty-three beautiful bath-houses under rules and regulations approved by the Secretary of the Interior and eleven are on the Reservation at the base of the Hot Springs Mountain, constituting what is known as Bath House Row. It is beautiful during the season (winter) when a light snow, which seldom falls, covers the lovely trees that border that side of the street and they nod their heavy heads and give one a clearer view of the handsome bath-houses with their elegant appointments—a sight that is worth

Beautiful Thoughts Make Beautiful Faces

MY pretty girls and I have learned together many wise secrets from cream-jar and powder box and other appurtenances of our toilet-table. We have talked about what to do with that annoying freckle or two which insists on bridging our nose; how to dispose of that little patch of superfluous hair which shades our upper lip; what method to use to send the pimples and blackheads scattering; and a hundred other subjects which have to do with beauty.

Look about you, Polly and Sue and Betty, and pick out among the women you know or meet, the one who seems to you the most beautiful or the most attractive. Sometimes a very plain woman has more of what we call attraction or charm than a faultlessly beautiful woman. Study the plain woman who "attracts" and see what is her secret. Then study the beautiful woman who has attraction as well—not the placidly handsome woman who is good to look at but has no drawing power—and find out in what lies her charm.

In every instance you will find that both the plain and the beautiful woman are attractive by reason of their expression. The eyes have kindliness and tenderness behind them, and a quiet sympathy; the mouth looks as if it had always said kindly, happy things, and every line of the face carries the memory of a smile.

We can all have charm, all possess attraction, though our snub nose turns skyward and our eyebrows are so pale as to be non-existent, and our cheeks bear the freckles of a hundred suns.

Let me tell you a secret: Beautiful thoughts make beautiful faces.

This sounds a little like preaching, but it isn't, girls. It is a real beauty sermon. If you don't believe me, consult your mirror at once. Let your face fall into its natural lines while you criticize it. Now, think of something which displeases or irritates you, and watch the change in your expression; permit yourself to feel contemptuous or impatient with someone, and see what marks it leaves upon your face; feel neglected or forlorn, and watch the corners of your mouth droop and the lines of your face lengthen.

Don't do this too long, for just looking unhappy sometimes results in making us so.

As an antidote, when you have seen your face grow unattractive as it will—under the influence of these unpleasant emotions, try the other kind. Feel joyously happy—your face becomes illumined; think of all the delightful people you have known and the pleasant things they have done for you, and watch the lines of your face soften; feel sympathy for someone in trouble, and see the eyes grow big and tender.

Then notice how your mouth curves under pleasant emotion. Watch it carefully, then let it fall back into the lines you have made natural for it, and see which expression you like the best. I know the answer! And, once you have found out that the mouth with its corners curved slightly up, the line of the lips not firm and straight but relaxed and softened, gives an expression of beauty or charm to your face, you will cultivate just that kind of a mouth.

Then examine your forehead. Are there any perpendicular wrinkles crossing its smooth surface? I don't like to say this, but as a matter of fact they wouldn't be there if you hadn't been indulging in unpleasant thoughts—in temper, irritability or worry. So begin to erase them at once by resolving to avoid just those states of mind. If you feel one coming on retire to your bedroom and shut yourself up with your mirror. It is a sure cure.

However, if you will promise not to let any more of those harsh little lines come into existence, we'll help you get rid of the ones that are already in evidence.

Cut yourself some rather wide but not long strips of heavy court plaster. At night, scrub the forehead with a complexion brush and hot soapy water; then rinse thoroughly, and dry quickly. While the flesh is still warm and plastic, spread the little lines out with the first and second fingers of your left hand smoothing with the first finger toward the left and with the second finger toward the right. With the right hand quickly paste a strip of the court plaster across the up-and-down lines near the top. Smooth out the wrinkles below this strip, and apply another plaster. Three strips will do the deed. Leave them on all night. In the morning, soften with warm water and remove immediately, washing the forehead with warm water, and, after drying massage across the wrinkles with finger-tips that have been dipped in cold cream.

If this trivial attention is given, night and morning, and the thoughts well looked after so that there will be no encouragement for the wrinkles to remain, it will be only a short time until the brow is as smooth and as pleasant to look upon as one could wish.

If you want to help train your mouth to pretty lines, practise curving up its corners, a few minutes at a time, several times a day. This is an excellent method for curing nervous headaches. You all know how, at such times, the temples seem to tie themselves up in tight knots and the nerves become tense and strained. Curve up the corners of your mouth and involuntarily the tension at the temple relaxes. Keep them curved, whatever your real emotions, and relaxation will set in.

Which goes to prove, I think, that if we thought gentle, kindly, happy thoughts always, we wouldn't have nervous headaches! It is only when we allow ourselves to feel continuously irritated, worried, or rushed, for some little space of time, that a nervous headache ensues. Remember this!

Massaging the cheeks up, to prevent the sagging or drooping of the muscles, will help in the good work. Of course, a good scrubbing with hot soapy water always precedes massage of any kind, and the fingers must be well anointed with cold cream. There should be no up-and-down movements on the cheeks, but the flat palms of the hands should rub the flesh up; stop, then rub up again, not touching the cheeks as the hand changes its position from top to bottom of cheek.

I don't need to say that this world would be a happier world for us, if we could always think happy, joyous thoughts, and see happy, joyous things about us; but I must emphasize again that it is also the royal road to beauty and to the possession of that attribute we call charm, which can make a plain girl be most popular in her neighborhood and make it possible for her to seem distinctly pretty even though by every law of beauty, she apparently is not.

So, I want my girls to take this, not as a preachment, but as a plea for their making themselves as beautiful and attractive as possible. The outside of us is after all, something like a window and whatever we have stored inside—beautiful things or ugly ones—is sure to show forth to the world. Think beautiful thoughts, girls, and the beautiful face will come.

Answers to Questions

Exercise to Induce Peristaltic Action

Lie flat on your back on the floor and clasp the hands behind the head. Place your feet under a bed or couch. Then slowly raise to a sitting position. Keep the body perfectly rigid, bending only at the waist; inhale as you go back, exhale as you rise. Practise this exercise five or ten minutes in the mo ing, while you are still in your night clothes.

Alice O'N.—I believe what you are referring to is the parsley bleach. This bleach is made by boiling a handful of parsley in a quart of distilled water until the parsley is reduced to a pulp. Then strain and add to the resulting liquid fifteen grains each of powdered alum, pulverized camphor and powdered borax. Shake well before mopping the face with a soft cloth or small sponge.

G. M. D.—I wonder if this is the hair-destroyer you have in mind:

Depilatory

Sulphuret of barium, three ounces; water, twelve ounces.

Mix into a paste by wetting corn-starch with the solution and apply to the offending hairs. When dry the hairs will come away with it. If this depilatory irritates the skin, rub in a good skin food. You must bear in mind that depilatories only remove the hairy growth temporarily, and that the roots will soon send out a new growth which will have to be burnt off again. For this reason this depilatory must not be used on the face or neck. If the arms are pimply or sore, do not use this remedy.

A Reader.—Liver spots are generally caused by some disordered condition of the internal organs of the body, and it is best to consult a reliable physician at once. Exercises, such as bending the body and rotary movements of the torso are extremely beneficial and should be practised ten minutes, morning and night. In addition walk two or three miles a day. A daily sponge bath before breakfast is an excellent liver tonic. The following lotion will be of assistance:

Bleach for Liver Spots

Boric acid, two drams; distilled witch-hazel, two ounces; cologne, two ounces.

If you wish a stronger bleach than this, I shall be glad to print one for you.

Hazel M. C. and A Reader.—Blackheads are a very common blemish, and it requires daily treatment to banish them. The first thing you want to take into consideration is the condition of your internal organs. If you suffer from indigestion or constipation, blackheads and ugly pimples will in most cases be the result. If indigestion is your trouble, from now on make a point to drink two glasses of hot water half an hour before each meal and before going to bed. For constipation, some mild cathartic such as my Fig-and-Senna Paste would be effective. Also, drink eight to ten glasses of cool water during the day, and get plenty of outdoor exercise. Eat wholesome, well-cooked food, and do not eat fried foods of any kind or rich pastries. A daily bath is imperative. This will open up all the pores in the skin and make them more able to do their work of throwing off poisonous matter. Give special attention to the face, scrubbing it with a complexion brush and hot soapy water. Scrub gently, so that the skin will not be irritated. After this, rub in a little boric powder. If this smarts the skin, rub in a little cold cream. Steam the face once a week over a basin of boiling water, then rub in a quantity of soap jelly. Omit the boric acid treatment that evening.

Soap Jelly for Blackheads

Pare a cake of Castile soap into three cups of water to which has been added one teaspoonful of powdered borax. Boil until mixture jellies. Put in covered glass jar, and use as wanted. A comedone extractor may be procured at most well-stocked drug-stores for twenty-five cents. Touch the spot with diluted alcohol to contract the open pores after you have extracted a blackhead by means of this instrument. Yes, I consider swimming very good exercise for girls. It is a woman's privilege to speak first when passing a man acquaintance on the street. If you wish to plumpen your bony neck, practise moving the head from side to side and backward and forward, with the muscles of the neck held taut. Practise this exercise for five minutes morning and night, until the desired results are accomplished. Also, massage the hollows at the base of the neck with a good plumpening cream.

M. H., Goldie C., Mrs. Midget and Mrs. W. E.—The remedy you speak of is a proprietary article and I am sorry I cannot give an opinion concerning it. The Epsom salts for the reduction of flesh is very simply made, as follows:

Epsom Salts Paste for Reduction of Flesh

Shave fine three quarters of a bar of white kitchen soap and place it on the stove in two cups of boiling water until it is entirely dissolved. Then when it is partially cool, stir in a cup of warm water in which you have dissolved a quarter of a pound of epsom salts. Rub this preparation into the fleshy parts at night, and let it dry on the skin. When morning comes, wash it off. Continue this treatment daily until the flesh disappears. Any other information you may wish in regard to reducing baths, dietary, etc., I shall be glad to give you at any time.

Melvina R.—The best way to remove the tiny wrinkles under the eyes is to coat the skin thickly with a good skin food and massage gently with a circular movement for four or five times daily. If, in addition you will coat the skin with the cream at night, after the face has been bathed in hot, soapy water, you will obtain results in a shorter time. You can make an excellent toilet water according to the following directions:

Parisian Toilet Water

Oil of lavender (Metcham), four drams; oil of rose, one half dram; oil of bergamot, three drams; tincture of musk, one half ounce; tincture of ambergris, one half ounce; rose-water, triple, one half ounce; alcohol, ninety-five per cent, one and one half pints.

Mix well, let stand for a week, and then filter through porous paper.

Grace R. R.—I am very pleased to hear that you were so successful with the Portugal Bust Food. Yes, I am always pleased to answer beauty letters, and you may ask as many questions as you like and they will receive attention through the columns of this department. Boric acid makes a delightful eye brightener and strengthener. Fill a glass eye-cup full of three per cent solution of the boric acid, and after pressing the cup into the eye socket, tip the head back and blink the eye, letting the liquid run into the eye. Repeat this bath daily and you will soon notice a marked improvement in the appearance of your eyes.

Jeannette B.—There is no denying that a too voluminous bosom is a beauty defect. In order to reduce it, bandage it with thin rubber sheeting and wear the bandages constantly. This bandaging will result in excessive perspiration which will break down the fatty tissues in time.

A. T. G.—If you possess a flabby chin, saturate a heavy cotton bandage with the following astringent, place under the chin, and tie at the top of the head. Leave the bandage on all night.

Alum Chin Astringent

Dissolve a small piece of alum in a cup of ice cold water.

Lotion for Oily Hair

A simple lotion for oily hair contains:

Borac acid, one dram; lavender water, one and one half ounces.

Rub this into the scalp until the oiliness is no more.

Hansel.—The only thing you can do, now, is to wait patiently until the gray strand you dyed has grown out to its natural color. Regrets generally follow in the path of home-dyed hair.

Violet.—You will find the following tooth powder a very excellent one:

Simple Tooth Powder

Powdered camphor, one ounce; precipitated chalk, four ounces; powdered orris root, eight ounces.

If you wish to whiten and soften the hands, rub the following cream into them several times a day:

Hand Whitening Cream

Lanolin, one hundred grams; liquid paraffin, twenty-five grams; extract of vanilla, ten drops; oil of roses, one drop.

Mrs. H.—Yes, it is possible to make your own smelling salts, and I am giving below formula for a liquid that is poured over the squares of carbonate of ammonia:

Oil of bergamot, one ounce; oil of verbena, one quarter ounce; attar of roses, one dram.

Keep the bottle tightly corked.

Marion.—A dandruff remedy containing one dram of boric acid and two and one half ounces of cologne water is a very simple and effective lotion. Apply to the scalp with a small sponge or with the finger-tips. A very simple shampoo that it would be well for you to use to aid in the removal of the dandruff is as follows:

Egg Shampoo for Dandruff

Break three eggs into a china bowl, and beat well together. Rub the eggs into the hair, allowing them to drain into a bowl of warm water, to which you have added the juice of half a lemon and a teaspoonful of salts of tartar. Shampoo vigorously, and the eggs will produce a splendid lather. When you feel that your hair is perfectly clean, rinse thoroughly and dry in the sun. I am sorry that it is against the rules of this department to give an opinion concerning a proprietary article.

Mrs. E. A. L.—Bandage your child's ears with a stout bandage at night, and let him wear it all night. Place the bandage securely under the chin and over the ears, and tie at the top of the head.

Reta from Sunny Land.—I do not approve of bleaching the hair. It will only make it brittle and retard the growth of the hair. Better let your hair remain the color it is. Your English and writing are very good.

Miss L. M.—One or two applications of the larkspur infusion will kill all the vermin in the hair. Here is the formula for it:

Larkspur Infusion

Pulverized larkspur seed, one dram; boiling water, one pint.

Wash the hair with this at night, and in the morning shampoo the hair thoroughly.

Mrs. D. R.—The pores of the nose are generally more enlarged than those of the forehead and cheeks, and are therefore more apt to become filled with dirt. In order to avoid trouble of this sort, scrub the nose with a soft complexion brush and hot soapy water. Do this every night, and spray the following astringent lotion over the nose after the bath, and several times during the day, as well:

Benzoin Astringent Lotion

Tincture of benzoin, thirty drops; hamamelis water, thirty drops; orange-flower water, two ounces.

Have your druggist put this lotion up for you, and place in a perfume atomizer that throws a fine stream. If your wrists are thin and scrawny, practise the following movements for five or ten minutes twice a day.

Exercise for the Development of the Wrist

Open and close the hand rapidly, using considerable tension. Also, try bending the wrists back as far as they will go. Do this gently, as the wrists are easily strained.

Chicago Girl.—Your dry and wrinkled skin is probably due to your not taking enough liquid into the system. It would be well for you to drink two quarts of water, at least, every day. With such treatment your skin will become more pliable, and the wrinkles will gradually disappear. You are entirely too young to have a wrinkled skin. In addition, after your face has had its nightly bath, coat the skin thickly with a good skin food and massage gently across the tiny lines several times. Then wipe the surplus cream off the face, and dash quantities of cold water over it, as this will firm the skin. A liquid powder would be the worst thing you could use with your skin in the condition it is at present.

May.—If your face has become tanned by the hot summer sun, wash it in sour milk every day. This will not only whiten, but soften the skin as well. A complexion brush should be wielded gently in order to secure the best results, otherwise the skin will become coarser and you will only make a bad matter worse.

Catherine.—The liquid rouge is obtained by mixing the following ingredients together:

Bloom of Rose

Pure brandy, one pint; benzoin, one half ounce; red sandal wood, one ounce; Brazil wood, one half ounce; alum, one half ounce.

Pour into a bottle and tightly cork it; agitate thoroughly once daily. After two weeks decant and use. Apply this lightly to the cheeks and it will defy detection.

Lorraine.—I do not blame you for wishing to bleach your freckles out of existence, as they detract greatly from one's good appearance. Apply the following bleach night and morning, and in a short time you will have an unblemished skin. Test the remedy on the arms before applying to face:

Freckle Remover

Rose-water, six ounces; glycerine, one half ounce; bitter almond water, two and one half drams; borax, one and one half drams; tincture of benzoin, two and one half drams.

Rub the borax up with the glycerine, gradually adding the rose and almond waters, lastly the tincture of benzoin, agitating the mixture all the time.

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

Patriotism and the Boy Scouts

IN beginning to talk to boys about patriotism, I find myself at once in a quandary, not because there is a lack of things to be said, but rather because of the very immensity of the subject. I know of no topic that is bigger or more important nor of any that touches the lives of everyone of us so intimately. Next to religious zeal or the pure love of God, it is probably the finest quality the human soul can attain. It has been defined in a thousand different ways but perhaps most aptly by this phrase, "love of one's country." How simple, indeed, those words are, how commonplace and hackneyed and oft repeated, and yet, they contain a wealth of meaning that is worth pondering over.

In the first place, this love of country has inspired a countless number of noble deeds, daring exploits and great sacrifices and has secured for you and me and all the world most of the material benefits that we enjoy today. Some of those benefits which you are familiar with are, peace and security, the right to a free education, protection from natural enemies, from fire and plague and epidemics, from thieves and injustice, liberty of conscience, in short, the right to be free and happy and to strive for a better existence. In many civilized countries only a few of those great blessings have been achieved. Militarism saps the resources of all of Europe and enforced service in the army robs many of a brilliant career. The greatest of all things to be accomplished in this world is genuine human liberty. Any sane, true and unselfish attempt to bring it about is a patriotic act. You do not have to wait until you are twenty-one years of age before beginning to be patriotic. It is not a condition of mind that comes in a slap on a certain day or hour. You do not enter it suddenly with a burst of joy and surprise, as one might enter a city after a long and tiresome journey. It is a consciousness that exists within you and it must be used and exercised and developed. This is done by reaching out and recognizing and doing to the best of your ability the thing that is nearest to you. The substance of all the great literary masterpieces and the sermon preached by every noble life is simply this; a life of service is the only life worth living. The service must be for others, for your country, for the world at large. To be able to serve humanity capably, you must fit yourself by study, clean thinking, good reading and plenty of wholesome outdoor play of the kind fostered by the Boy Scout organization. This is patriotism of the right sort and it certainly must follow that a lazy, negligent and selfish life is a species of treason. If you do not love your country enough to find out what you can do to make things a little better and then go and do those things you will be on a par with the soldier who refused to go to the defence of his town, even though the tramp of the approaching enemy was heard. It is sublime to die for a good cause but it is better to live for it and strive to advance it by constant, voluntary acts. Keep in mind that grand motto, "Do a good turn daily." The sum total of good accomplished in a few years of even one boy's life would amount to a whole lot; the aggregate benefit derived from an order as large as the Boy Scouts would be almost immeasurable. You will find real pleasure in doing your part well. It will give your life aim and direction and aid you to cultivate the grandest of all virtues, unselfishness.

It seems to me that all the wars, fights, debates and political contests that ever occurred were but incidents in the age old struggle of mankind for genuine freedom. The patriotism of a few has been the mainspring of all this strife and is therefore the force that has brought us up from savagery. In the world today, there is a great deal of preventable misery and since no one can be really happy unless all are happy, the Scout with his fine sense of duty and honor need not look for an opportunity to transmute those principles into acts of kindness. The chance to gain a place on history's pages may not come to you, but a chance of some importance will come. Perhaps you do not realize it, but it has already come and will continue with you as long as you live. Nothing could be more false than the ancient idea that opportunity knocks only once at every man's door. I doubt that anyone ever believed it. Every good resolution is the germ of success and no success worth while can be achieved in a few days. Be patient and never quit trying and it will come to you, but, as a matter of fact, it doesn't really come at all, that is, from the outside. It is within you all the time, hidden away somewhere. Its growth is slow like that of a plant or tree. You, and you alone, can aid this growth or retard it or stop it altogether. I will not attempt to tell you how, because no man is big enough or broad enough or wise enough to do that. However, we may get down to brass tacks and consider the question in this manner.

Whenever we wish to acquire knowledge of any subject, we proceed to study it and almost the first step in our study will be the selection of models or chief exponents of the science or profession or quality we seek to know about. If we were in search of information about Polar expeditions, the names of Peary and Scott and Amundsen would at once occur to our minds; to learn about the Christianizing of the world, we would delve into the Bible and read the wonderful story of the Savior and His followers; the study of the drama or poetry would bring Shakespeare into our lives; in order to grasp the essentials of music or literature, law or oratory, physical culture or athletics, or in fact any phase of human activity, it is helpful to know the life and work of any one who proved to be a great success. Coming back to the subject of patriotism, to American boys at least, two names loom out ahead of all others. You can easily guess that they are Washington and Lincoln. As exemplars of unstained character and unswerving devotion to the cause of liberty; as mighty toilers for the highest ideals in government, and willingness at all times to sacrifice personal glory and ambition, that such grand object might be achieved, they have few equals and no superiors in history. If we read about them in the right spirit, we can sense, in some small degree, the fine glow of feeling they must have experienced in conceiving and promoting their noble enterprises.

Washington was justly styled the "Father of his Country," because of the leading part he played in winning its independence, and from the the fact that he was the first president. With great skill and courage he led the continental army through seven years of discouraging warfare and by sheer force of his personality won ultimate victory. Sometimes his troops suffered great privations and grew restless, discontented and mutinous; sometimes dissensions arose in Congress and among the states; sometimes appointments and promotions in the army caused jealousy which threatened to disrupt it, but, in every situation, he proved to be master, and brought the jarring factions together, by infusing into their hearts some of his own unquenchable and immeasurable love of country. When, at the end of the war, the officers and troops, outraged by the unjust treatment of Congress, proposed to make him king, he indignantly refused and by appealing to their patriotic principles, successfully urged them to submit to proper authority and help to work out the problems of peace. Finally, when he had completed his second term as president and was importuned to accept the office again, he modestly and steadfastly declined and thereby established a precedent which will be of inestimable value, as long as time lasts. In every crisis, we can see his oneness of purpose, in every decision we feel that he was moved by the highest patriotism.

In Abraham Lincoln, we have another almost perfect type of patriot. He stands out in history as the great lover of humanity. Look at his portrait and you will see how deeply suffering has graved his kindly countenance. More than he bore no man can ever bear, for the woes of a whole nation rested on his heart. He was the healer of his country's ills; the master surgeon who sewed up the gaping wound that threatened its life. Through the long, desolate period of war, he administered the affairs of government with consummate skill, with patience and fortitude and kindness. He was maligned and criticized and blamed more than any chief magistrate had ever been but in peace and with forbearance he stood it all. His one mission in life, as he often stated, was to save his country, and the unpleasant incidents he encountered in the fulfillment of this mission were as nothing to him. Who, among us, can measure the love he bore his country or count the sacrifices he made to promote its welfare. When, in the trying days of the war, his little son took sick, he chose with sublime submission to Fate's decree, to remain away from the bedside that he might attend to the pressing affairs of the nation. Night after night, he labored at his desk, hoping against hope that the cloud of woe would be lifted, not only from his home, but from his beloved native land as well. He would not listen to his friends when they urged him to spend more time with his afflicted family, because, though he loved them dearly, he knew that hundreds, and perhaps thousands, would suffer if he neglected his presidential duties. Half starved soldiers in prison might be waiting for an exchange or a reprieve; condemned men might be hourly expecting a pardon; accused persons anxiously praying for judgment; and, even the guilty, seeking hopefully for his forgiveness. Besides this vitally important routine work, the waiting-room of the White House was usually crowded with forlorn women, mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts, pleading for the lives and liberty of their loved ones. "They are all my children," he said, "and I must not neglect the many for the one." When his beloved child passed away, although grief shook his giant form as the wind stirs a leaf, he uttered no word of complaint but bore the cruel blow in silence and resignation. It was the supreme test and his manner of withstanding it teaches us to what great heights patriotism may lift the human soul. Lincoln's faith in divine Providence was never shaken. All his public utterances are tinged with it. Constantly, in his speeches, he referred to a ruling Power, and no doubt it was his love of God that sanctified and glorified his love of country. The Gettysburg speech, which epitomizes his work and character so well, reads almost like a prayer. I hope that every boy will like it well enough to commit it to memory. It contains the sentiments that make true patriots, and will, if properly understood, lend a new and more sacred meaning to your sense of loyalty to the flag. Think, what those great leaders and scores of others, did to preserve the flag from defeat and dishonor. Surely their example is worth emulating.

Unfortunately for you boys, history deals mostly with war deeds, and you are apt to get the impression that a patriot must be a great soldier or conqueror. This is all wrong. The true love of country can find expression in time of peace as well as on the field of battle. Honor the intrepid warriors who preserved our nation, with your whole heart and soul, but remember, at the same time, that your own town or locality, is just as much a part of the United States as the field of Gettysburg was on that memorable fourth of July. Whatever you do to improve it or make it a better place to live in, comes under the head of patriotism. You can begin by curbing your own more or less natural disposition to be reckless and destructive. For instance, instead of throwing refuse on the public thoroughfare or where it will appear unsightly, carry it to a proper place or receptacle. It is not, that I would have you become a street cleaner, but, emphatically I do urge you to cease to be careless in scattering or spreading rubbish. In German cities, the sidewalks and pavements are as clean as a parlor floor because the people are educated not to throw even a scrap of paper or burnt match or a cigar butt upon them. When you begin to practise a civic virtue, like helping to keep your town clean, others may laugh at you at first, but if you are in earnest and persist, they will gradually be shamed into following your example. Here is an instance of what may be done by any gang of boys. In a certain village the lads had no convenient ball grounds, but in a most desirable place was a vacant field that belonged to a man who was rather hard on youngsters. The plot was an eyesore because it had been used for a dumping ground and was grown high with weeds. The boys wanted it badly but were afraid to approach the owner on the subject. After talking it over a dozen times, they hit on the bright idea of having some influential person plead for them. The town doctor was a jovial man of very wide acquaintance and they swooped down upon him in a body. He fell in with their plans immediately and taking several of the older lads with him sought out the landowner. The latter was rather glum that morning and at first it seemed like a lost cause. However, the doctor grew enthusiastic and pointed out to him that the lads merely wanted to play on the ground and to do that they would have to level it off and improve it, which would be really a favor to him. This line of talk won the day and he consented to let them have it. Immediately they set to work with rakes and hoes and shovels and after a few strenuous days the place was in good shape. It goes without saying that the fixing up of the ground proved to be the best kind of sport. The boys had promised to be reasonably quiet in their play and to desist altogether when any nearby neighbor requested them to do so. None of the neighbors made such a request however, being influenced in the right direction, I imagine, by the good example set by the once grumpy landowner. When the grounds were in use a while it was discovered that home base was so near a barn that pitched balls and tick fouls constantly rapped against it. This, in time brought a complaint and for a while it appeared as though the boys were about to lose their well-earned right to play. However a meeting was called and an ex-ballplayer easily solved the difficulty by suggesting that they build a backstop of canvas or poultry netting. As a matter of fact, the man who had complained was so well pleased that he built the backstop himself at his own expense. Thus, by being patriotic enough to respect the rights of others, the boys of this town won a playground and made a host of friends. A good practise is to be constantly on the lookout to protect life and limb. If some careless person has left a bonfire smouldering near a fence or building, put it out, or if you haven't time, at least, call the person's attention to it who is apt to suffer loss. Should you see a hole or dangerous spot near the skating place, put up some kind of danger signal or warn people going that direction. Suppose a large icicle is hanging over the door of a wee cottage occupied by a feeble old couple; will you pass it by or will you get a pole and knock it down? Those commonplace instances suggest hundreds of others. It is better to do one good turn than to merely think about doing a hundred. Team work is what counts most. Not much public good can be accomplished by one alone. Let us suppose that the school ground is muddy and poorly drained and that the building needs a new flag. You could not correct both conditions yourself, but you can start the good work. Organize an improvement club. Seek advice from men who know. They will tell you how to go about the work and will supply you with tools and material. Once the work is started everyone will gladly lend a hand. Money for the flag can be obtained by working at odd jobs or getting contributions outright. It only takes a little money and everyone will want to be on the list of donors. You know, of course, that the flag is the visible emblem of our country and that it contains thirteen stripes to represent the thirteen original states and one star for each existing state. It is in effect a concise history of our country. Every soldier on duty must salute it by raising the right hand at attention. Every boy should do likewise. Since no applicant can become a Scout until he is able to tell the history and composition of the flag, we may say, with pride, that patriotism is the foundation upon which this great movement is built. I feel certain also, that this same love of country and zeal for the public welfare, is a vital thing in the heart and soul of every true American boy. Let us love and revere the old flag and willingly do our share toward making it really stand for the principles that gave it birth.

SKIN DISEASE.—I have three pigs. They have scabs all over them, coming off and leaving sore places. C. R.

A.—Wash the pigs with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip, used hot. You can buy the dip at a drug-store. Afterward apply every three days a mixture of two ounces of sulphur and half an ounce of the dip shaken up in a pint of sweet oil. Keep the pigs out of wet and filth.

PARALYSIS.—I have a sow which was taken with something like fits. She could not use her legs for a long time. Now she can use her body and fore legs. Her hind legs seem drawn up and wasting away. Her pigs were eight days old when she was taken. MRS. R. W. C.

A.—You might as well put the sow out of her misery as paralysis is present and the muscles are wasting away. Recovery would be unlikely and treatment therefore unprofitable. Such a condition is brought on by the drain and strain of nursing affecting a sow that has been pampered and that has come from pampered stock.

FOUNDER.—I have a saddle horse which appears to be sorefooted in the front feet, walking better on soft ground than hard. When walking he throws one foot in front of the other. He has been this way six months. B. O.

A.—An attack of founder no doubt caused the condition described. Have the soles of both fore feet covered with pine tar and oakum and then with thick leather pads on top of which put on flat, wide-webbed bar shoes. Then clip the hair from the hoof-heads of both fore feet and blister them, one at a time, with a mixture of one part of powdered cantharides and three parts of lard, at intervals of two weeks.

LAME CATTLE.—I have a heifer two years old. Her hoofs have been split for a year; they are sore. I have a cow with two of her hoofs split and sore. It bothers them to walk. MRS. W. M. A.

A.—This is not ordinarily a contagious disease, but is due to standing in wet and filth or wading through filth, rank wet grass or grit. Cleanse the parts, poultice with hot flaxseed meal for a few days, then cover the parts with cotton or oakum saturated with a five per cent solution of coal tar disinfectant. Renew the dressing daily.

CHOREA.—I have a three-year-old Jersey cow that throws her head down nearly to the ground and jerks her body backward. At the same time her eyes are set and she does not appear to notice anything going on about her. She slobbers, and sometimes lolls her tongue, the muscles in her mouth twitching. She will jerk her front feet eight or ten inches from the ground. Sometimes she will only have one or two spells and at other times she will have fifteen or twenty, one right after another. She has been that way for a year but is getting worse.

A.—The disease appears to be chorea (St. Vitus' dance) which is practically incurable. It is common in horses, but comparatively rare in cattle. Possibly the ailment is aggravated by indigestion, or excitement. Give her a physic of epsom salts and keep her quiet. When the symptoms are severe give half ounces of bromide of potash every four hours in water.

ITCH.—I have a pony, bought it two months ago. It had an itch. The hair stands up in little tufts and then falls out. The skin appears to be scaly or dry. I cannot keep it clean. I give bran and oats mixed, made wet, twice a day. S. S.

A.—This probably is an eczematuous condition due to indigestion from overfeeding and lack of exercise. Stop all grain feed and substitute bran, roots, hay and fodder. Have the pony clipped, then wash affected parts with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip at intervals of three or four days. Work or exercise the pony thoroughly every day.

QUITTOR.—I have a horse six years old. Last spring he injured one of his hoofs. It will not heal. It does not appear to bother him. F. H. D.

A.—There is no good reason why the case should not prove curable, if you can employ an experienced graduate veterinarian who will scrape away all the diseased tissue in the discharging fistula and inject a saturated solution of corrosive sublimate. The part should then be poulticed with hot flaxseed meal for a week, then injected again and the hoof-head blistered after cleansing and drying. After the blister has been put on inject into the discharging place every other day a little of a 1-1000 solution of formaldehyde. The veterinarian should remove the shoeboil by knife and then treat as common wound.

GARGET.—I have a filly four years old which brought a colt in May. She has had a sore udder since the colt came. It swells, breaks, and discharges and goes down a little. The colt is still nursing. Do you think best to wean it? What is the cause of the trouble?

A.—Wean the foal at once and do not rebreed the filly as her udder is permanently ruined for milk production. Inject a little tincture of iodine into the discharging places twice a week and each day rub the udder with a mixture of one part of mercurial ointment and two parts of lanolin or lard. She had an attack of inflammation of the udder (mammitis or garget) possibly due to infection, bruise or chill.

MANGE.—I have a mule which has skin disease. It is itchy and somewhat scabby. A. A. M.

A.—If the disease is true mange it will spread with certainty to other horses in the same stable. Most likely it is something more simple. Have the horse clipped; then wash affected parts with a 1-50 solution of coal tar dip made creamy with flowers of sulphur. Repeat the washing in a week if necessary. Give the horse a tablespoonful of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning until well; then gradually discontinue the medicine taking at least a week to the work.

CATARRH.—I have a Scotch Collie dog that has trouble with his head and throat. He makes a snuffling noise and in the morning sneezes, causing an offensive discharge from his nose. He usually has a good appetite, but sometimes he will refuse his food for two or three days. MRS. C. G.

A.—The dog has catarrh and cough. The latter may be due to chronic bronchitis. Give him a teaspoonful of glyco-heroin twice a day and if necessary increase to three such doses a day.

PANTING.—I have a mare fourteen years old. For the last four years she has had what I call "dry panting." She sweats but little and pants very hard in summer when working her. (2) I lost a four-months-old colt last month. She died with congestion of the bowels. J. P. B.

A.—The mare has been overheated at some time or another and never will be comfortable in hot weather. Have her clipped fall and spring. Work her in the cool of the morning and evening. Do not feed corn in hot weather. Allow small drinks of cold water often when at work. Drugs will do no good. (2) It will be necessary for you to give us a full description of the symptoms present and the history of the case so that we may be able to make an intelligent diagnosis and prescribe confidently for the trouble.

SPAVIN.—I have a mule that goes lame on the right hind leg, and he rests it the most of the time. He is losing flesh and flinches when I press on the lower part of his hoof joint. A. J. S.

A.—The mule probably has a bone spavin on the hock and if so you should have a graduate veterinarian fire and blister the joint and spavin and then tie the mule up short in stall for a six weeks' rest.

FOUNDER.—I have a three-year-old horse, that was water foundered about three months ago. Is there any remedy? D. H. P.

A.—There is no such disease as "water founder," but we shall be glad to give you advice if you care to send us a detailed description of the symptoms present. This always is necessary in asking veterinary advice in this department.

ITCH.—I have two cows and a calf that has some kind of a skin disease. Small blisters appear, and after they break, a hard scab forms. The cattle are rubbing and licking themselves all of the time. MRS. R. L.

A.—Isolate the affected cattle and wash them with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip made creamy with flowers of sulphur. Repeat the application as often as found necessary. The disease may be scab.

LOSS OF HAIR.—I have a mare that does not appear to be in good health. She has shed all of her mane and tail and the hair comes off in spots all over her body. The hair starts to grow and when about three inches long falls out. O. O. S.

A.—It would be well to have the mare clipped and then wash affected parts with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip made creamy with flowers of sulphur. Let the lotion dry upon the skin and repeat the treatment at intervals of a week. See that chicken lice are kept out of the stable. They often cause skin trouble of horses. Night and morning give the mare half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic until she has a healthy coat of hair. Carrots and flaxseed meal would be good adjunct feeds for this mare.

TOUGHEY

shudderingly drew in their feet and legs which they had hitherto allowed to dangle over the low, board railing in the bed of the buggy. Toughey, who was now following the buggy, laughed at their fears and could not forbear remarking, though with some difficulty:

"Look out children! snakes can climb!"

"You bet they can," was Len's surprising, and to Toughey, disconcerting rejoinder. "But these cowardly chicken snakes are glad to run away and besides," he continued, "I'd just like to see one try to get into this buggy!" And touching Dixie with the whip he increased her speed to such an extent that the children clung to each other, even forgetting to bestow upon Toughey the usual clubbing following her mistakes.

In a few minutes they reached the substantial cement tank at one side of the windmill. Here they stopped and everybody, including Moon and Dixie, had a drink of the fine artesian water.

The ponies had not been seen but it was hoped to find them during the return trip upon which they now started.

Leaving the natural depression in which the tank was situated and taking their way slowly up the long incline, their attention was attracted to the increasing number of cattle in sight. They appeared on every slope and filled the air with their bellowing. It soon became apparent that the buggy was the cause of their excitement and they began to move towards it, slowly at first, then faster and finally at a swift pace that brought them rapidly nearer.

"They think we have salt," said Len. "Old Isum always brings it to them in this buggy."

Mrs. Deering was interested when a little later they were milling around the buggy and Len was pointing out the finer grades to her. Just then came a wail from the children.

"They're goin' to hook us!" they chorused.

"No they won't," said Len reassuringly

"Give us the whip!" they demanded, and although Len laughed, he complied with the request and the children proceeded to beat at the heads of the more intrusive cows.

But the fight proved so unequal that they again appealed for help.

"Go faster, Len! faster!" they screamed. "They will hook us!"

Len responded by slapping Dixie vigorously with the reins, and uttering loud whoops of "Mula! Mula!" succeeded in urging her into a swift gallop.

But the cows, bent on getting salt, only increased their pace and crowded closer on the little girls. As Mamma looked back with an encouraging smile, a big, red-eyed bull thrust his drooping horns so close to the children and, as it seemed even to her, with such a menacing twist of his head, that she was glad when they came tumbling over the back of the seat into her lap. From this safe position, it became an easy matter to laugh at their former fears and to sympathize with their recent foes, the poor, disappointed cows, and even to regard themselves as culprits for not having brought the salt.

All this time Toughey had been sorely tried. In the beginning, when she found herself in the midst of the bellowing cattle, she had given herself up for lost, confident that her last hour had come. But, as time passed and the pony did not notice them and she began to realize that she was not being gored nor likely to be, her courage rose and gradually making her way to the outskirts of the herd she reached the gate almost as soon as Len did. There they parted with their noisy followers, although for a long time afterwards their voices could be heard.

The drive home was cool and pleasant, and as they descended again into the hollows, they got entirely away from the sun. By the time they reached the open road and again looked out over the plantation, the sun was so low behind the hill that the valley and Pecan Grove were already in shadow.

Nurse was ready with supper for them, and during its progress Toughey and the children lived over their experience with the cattle.

There was but one regret connected with the trip; they had not seen the ponies, and while tomorrow seemed a long way off and a long time to wait, they fell asleep that night with many happy thoughts of the rides they were to have during the beautiful days ahead of them on the Plantation.

Toughey's reflections were soberer, and as she sat with Mamma on the gallery in the quiet starlight her talk showed that behind all the fun and pleasure, she felt the beat of Nature's great heart and realized that it was worthy of the deepest love and most earnest study.

A Pretty Skin Makes a Pretty Face

Stuart's Calcium Wafers Cleanse the Skin Very Quickly and Make It Clear and White.

Do you envy the girl with the delicate tints and the rosy glow of good health on her face? Do you long for the perfect freshness and beauty of her complexion? The means of gaining them are within your reach this very minute.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers will work this wonderful miracle of good looks for you within a very few days. No matter how covered with pimples, rash, eczema or any sort of skin eruption your face may be—no matter how dull and yellow your skin appears—your complexion will be transformed almost instantly into all that is lovely and desirable.

"Everybody loves a pretty face and a delicate skin."

Face lotions and creams merely alleviate the irritation of the skin—they are of no permanent value. Stuart's Calcium Wafers go right after the cause of pimples—the poisons and impurities in the blood. They chase them into the pores, change them into gases that are easily eliminated and then stimulate the pores into throwing them out. There is no waste of time—no fooling around. These little wafers assimilated into the blood, work night and day until every impurity is gotten rid of and you not only have a clear complexion but pure, vigorous blood that endows you with new life and energy.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers contain nothing harmful—nothing but what thousands of physicians have used and recommended. Its chief constituent, calcium sulphide, is universally recognized as the most powerful of blood purifiers.

Surprise your friends by meeting them with a face radiant with loveliness instead of the disagreeable, pimply one they are used to. Give yourself the supreme happiness that the consciousness of good looks and the power of attraction will bring you.

Buy a box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers today and see how quickly the pimples will disappear. They can be obtained at any drug store at 50 cents a box. They come in a form convenient to carry and are pleasant to the taste. A small sample package will be mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

Girl's Waterproof Cape

A Great PROTECTOR From WIND and RAIN

Made of striped rubberized cloth with suitable lining, and the best feature of this cape is the hood. Girls going to school do not like to carry an umbrella, and this cape can be worn either in hot or cold weather. If in winter a sweater or coat can be worn underneath, and the child is not only dry but perfectly warm. There are two openings in the cape for the arms, but the garment is large enough so the books or packages can be carried underneath, which makes it much better than a Rain Coat. The shoulders are shaped so as to give it a very attractive look. This cape comes in a very dark drab color with lighter drab stripes. They are so pretty any girl will be proud to wear one. Sizes 6 to 14 years. When ordering better order it larger than necessary so to have it of sufficient size to go over a heavy coat or other garments. Boys can easily get up clubs and thus get one of these Rain Capes for their sisters. Girls like to get subscribers to COMFORT where they can so easily earn such a sensible premium so as to keep warm and dry during the rainy season. We are prepared to fill all orders promptly.

Special Club Offer:

For a club of only seven subscribers to COMFORT at 25 cents each for 15 months, we will send you by Parcel Post one of these serviceable Rain Capes. Premium No. 529.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Blue Bell, Charleston, W. Va.—It is quite proper to ask a gentleman to call, even though he has been going with you for almost nine months. But why have you not already asked him? (2) It is no longer good form for a lady to hold a gentleman's hat when at church. (3) We do not think a lady should answer four letters a week from a gentleman unless she is very much in love with him, indeed. Some in love write as often as fourteen times a week.

J. B. U., Saskatoon, Sask.—A girl five feet ten should never wear any stripes up and down. If they encircle they will make her look shorter. But why wish to look short? Tall girls are more stylish. With brown hair and brown eyes you may wear any color that is not too pronounced, but some shade of red rather sets off the brown more than other colors do. For a nice stylish dress to wear at your work in the store, get some plain dark material, or gray, and have it made very simply and to fit snugly. Frills and furbelows and flowing gowns are not good to work in. A black-and-white shepherd plaid would make a very handsome and serviceable suit.

Country Girl, Covedale, Ky.—An eighteen-year-old girl five feet nine inches tall weighing one hundred and forty-five pounds is about right, as one hundred and fifty-five pounds is average and she will fill out as she grows older. The minimum weight is one hundred and thirty-one pounds, maximum, one hundred and seventy-nine. (2) The simplest way to introduce people is the nicest and that is merely to say: "Mrs., Miss, or Mr. Blank let me introduce, or present, Mrs., Miss or Mr.," as the case may be, always introducing the gentleman to the lady. When strangers enter a roomful of company, it is not the best form to introduce them all around, but to two or three desirable persons and let them later seek whom they please, or they may talk to other guests without introduction when they have been started. (3) Correspondence cards are cards instead of sheets of paper and are used formally or in writing short notes.

Blue Eyes, Fisk, Mo.—Having made one mistake in marrying and with that mistake still under the same roof with you, do you think you would improve matters any by trying another man who has a female mistake under his roof? We do not believe you would better yourself any and you owe it to your "three sweet little girls" to bear your burdens for their sake. Their influence on their father may improve his treatment of you, particularly when they are older and he will be ashamed to earn their disapproval. By and by, if he is still ugly, you and your daughters can leave him, and that may make a better man of him. But don't make your mistake any worse by taking another mistaken person to live with.

Country Belle, Ft. Wayne, Ind.—Usually when a young lady is referred to as "fast" it is not meant that she is too forward, but is, as you say, "tough." She may not be really bad, but she shows the signs. (2) When a young lady and gentleman cease their going together, they should be polite to each other and speak when meeting in any company, though they may avoid each other as much as they please. It is not agreeable for others to be embarrassed by the personal differences of two people who cannot get along together. (3) Buggy riding with one's beau is all right if it is the custom of the community.

Anxious, Leadville, Colo.—If your friendship for this girl who used to be your chum is based wholly upon rules of etiquette, you may be very formal in your renewal of the friendship when she has returned to your town after a long absence. If your friendship is the real thing you will not wait to act upon formal rules, but get around to see her just as quickly as you can. Etiquette is one thing and friendship another and a very different matter.

A. R., Manassas, Ga.—What's the matter with you, anyhow? Haven't we repeatedly explained in this column that dealing in or handling so-called "Love powders" in any way is illegal and will subject the offender to arrest and possible imprisonment? What do you want more to believe it? Do you want to be arrested and disgraced before you will believe? Other COMFORT readers, please, take notice. Most love powders are harmless, powerless frauds.

Somebody's Sweetheart, Cottage Wood, Minn.—As you have been engaged to the young man for five months, we think it is within your rights to ask him if he does not think you should have an engagement ring and also if he has any good reason for not talking about your marriage as a definite reality. Possibly he is one of the kind of young men who become engaged merely to enjoy greater liberties. If he is not seriously intending to carry out the engagement, you should break it at once. A set of cuff buttons would make a very appropriate Christmas gift and even less than three dollars will be enough to pay for them, but do not give them to him until this engagement matter is definitely settled.

Cherry, Yale, Mich.—Sorry, but there is no known method of winning them back when once they are really lost. Simply make up your mind to accept your losses bravely, and for the sake of your friends don't go around moping about it and refusing to see anybody and yearning all the time for him who is gone. Of course, your heart may be sore and you may not feel very cheerful, but don't make a public exhibition of your sorrow and don't let it conquer you, but you conquer it and accept philosophically the goods the gods send you. Thousands have done it before you and so can you if you will.

K. B., Watkins, Minn.—An aunt and nephew by blood, not marriage, cannot be legally married in the United States as far as we know the law, and should not marry if they could. Such a marriage is repugnant to every sense of decent order.

Black Eyes, Zach, Tenn.—The gentleman opens the gate for the lady at her own house, but she opens the door of the house, as it is supposed that he has no right of entrance into a house not his own. You ask him in exactly as you would ask anybody else. Why not?

C. V. M., Jasper, Ala.—A bow is often as much as is necessary in acknowledging an introduction, either by the lady or gentleman. However to say something—"I am glad to meet you," or some other oral recognition—is better when it can be said fitly. (2) If the marriage is with a ring, the ring must be placed on the bride's finger as part of the ceremony.

Miss. Gray, N. C.—Etiquette condemns all familiarities.

Schoolmates, Bexar, Texas.—It is quite proper for a lady to go to church with a gentleman in a buggy.

Sunflower, Osprey, Fla.—Fifteen years between the lady and gentleman is not too much if the man is of youthful spirit and both of them are fairly mature. That is to say, a man of forty is not too old for a woman of twenty-five, while a girl of twenty shouldn't marry a man past thirty, unless there were very good reasons why the difference in age should not count. Again when two people are really in love with each other, age doesn't count. (2) We think it would be proper for the young lady to tell her mother if she were kissed by her sweetheart before another lady. (3) The young man may take the girl's arm if she has no objection.

Schoolma'm, Driscoll, N. Dak.—It is quite proper to write to the young man who wants to marry you, but whom you do not wish to marry, but your letters should in nowise lead him to believe that you may change your mind and yet accept him. That is neither fair to him, nor honorable in you. Make it plain to him that you are writing merely as a friend and he can expect no more. And don't write regularly so he will begin to look for your letters. When a man is in love and losing, he grasps at the least straw.

Brown Eyes, Charleston, S. C.—When you are at a party at the home of your fiance, you should act exactly as any other guest, unless you are asked by the family to lend a hand in looking after the company. In that case you lose your identity as guest and become assistant to the hostess, and should act accordingly.

Ignorant, Darlington, Ind.—It is quite proper for a lady to ask a "gentleman friend" to write to her when he goes away, but don't say "gentleman friend." (2) It's a pity you didn't know enough to go home when the party was over and staid all night. The young man's sister must have thought you were impossible and we are not surprised that he left next morning without seeing you. It is not so much a question whether you should speak to him when you meet him again, as whether he will want to speak to you. We suggest that you inform yourself on social usage before attempting any more society affairs.

G. K., Belpre, Kans.—You should not be so anxious for the young man to call. He has given you his picture and that should console you during his absence. When he is ready to call he will do so and in the meantime you must wait. If you should see him at any time, you might ask him when he would call.

Red Head, Philadelphia, Tenn.—If you have been writing to him for two years hoping that he would propose and he has not done so, we advise that you stop the correspondence. It's a waste of hope and postage. (2) In response to your inquiry: "It is good for one to Bee constantly dreaming of one that dozent care for them, or is it Best to show them they are as much to me as I am to them?" we would say that it is not. Still, we may be mistaken and you might dream a while longer if you are sure the dream will not change into a nightmare. Dreams do that sometimes, you know.

Linked by Fate

pact was too serious. Murder! Yes, it was murder. And did I shrink from it? And am I to be robbed—robbed—robbed——"

He staggered, and, making for the chair, fell into it, his head sunk on his breast, his long, thin hands extended, as if to clutch at something.

Vane strode to the decanter, but he would not touch it—it was contaminated by that other hand. He went to the half-conscious wretch and grasped him by the shoulder and shook him; and presently Julian opened his eyes, and, looking up saw Vane—and knew him.

"Vane!" he cried.

"Murderer!" said Vane sternly.

Julian struggled to his feet and held out his hand, with a quavering laugh.

"Is it you? No ghost, but yourself!" he faltered thickly.

"Yes, it is I!" said Vane sternly, and yet with the pity one extends to the insane, criminals though they may be.

"Then—then you escaped?" said Julian. "How? I am glad, very glad! But—how?"

"Deborah, the deaf mute," said Vane huskily. "She saved me—I wrapped my coat round her —— You hound! The woman who was devoted to you gave her life——"

Julian shrugged his shoulders, and drew his hand across his brow, as if to clear away the mist that enshrouded his brain.

"Deborah! I never thought of that. I thought she had fled—in horror! Deborah! Poor woman! Oh, poor woman!"

His voice broke, then he laughed the laugh of the insane.

"And I have shown your ghost—you, in fact—the whole bag of tricks. I have given myself away? Yes?"

Vane's stern eyes answered him.

"Well? What are you going to do? You can't accuse your own cousin, your own flesh and blood, of murder! Think of the scandal! The indelible stain on the family name! You won't do that; what will you do?"

He had the best of it, as Vane felt.

"I ought to strangle you, kill you by any means, you—you traitor!" he said. "Get out of my sight! Get out of England—anywhere. I will see that you do not want. I will write to you; leave your address with Tressider. Get out of my sight. Wait!" as Julian walked with incredible steadiness to the door. "Tell me—tell me that Judith knew nothing of your hellish plot; that she is innocent of any complicity in your crime!"

Julian smiled. "My dear Vane, I wish I could set your mind at rest on that point; but I can't. I don't say that Judith was aware, fully aware, of the modus operandi; that she knew exactly how I was going to—remove you; but I'll swear that she knew you were to be removed! If you have listened attentively to my confession, you must have gathered that fact."

"Liar! Murderer!" said Vane.

"Murderer—well, yes, I admit; but a liar—I never lied yet. Lying is vulgar—and useless. But Judith. Oh, yes, 'when you are master,' et cetera. Oh, she knew! I saw it by her face that night, heard it in her shriek. And, mind you, Judith must abide by the compact. Judith is mine! Mine, by the right of the price I have paid for her! Not yours!" He advanced threateningly, his hand upraised, his fingers clutching at the empty air. "Not yours! You would not have sinned as I have done for her. You——"

His voice sank, and he laughed.

"Pardon! You will admit my claim to her. I am going. You will not see me again. When a man loses, as I have lost, after such a struggle, effort, he should efface himself. I admit that. I am going, and you will not see me or be troubled by me again."

He walked, quite steadily now, toward the table.

"Will you allow me to use a telegraph form? Thanks."

In horrified silence Vane drew back and watched him. He took a form from the stationery stand, and, after a moment's thought, wrote a message, very plainly and distinctly.

When he had finished he rose, looked at Vane with a calm, cool, indeed critical gaze, then with a smile said:

"Thanks! Good by!"

Vane watched him as he went out of the room, then sank into a chair—not the chair in which Julian had sat—and buried his face in his hands. How long he sat he knew not, then or ever; but, suddenly remembering the unhappy wretch, he sprang to his feet and hurried into the hall.

He almost ran into the arms of Prance, who uttered a yell of amazement and fear, calling on his name:

"Lord Lesborough!"

"Mr. Julian!" cried Vane.

"Mr. Julian? Lord Lesborough! His lordship went out a quarter of an hour ago! But—but—oh, lord, who are you, sir? Oh, my lord, is it you, is it you?"

The whole household was in confusion. The clamor of tongues, the cries, and screams, and tears of relief and thanksgiving so confused Vane that he was thwarted in his intention of following the unhappy man. But, at last, he got a carriage and drove to the station, to find that Julian had departed by the train which had left a few minutes before Vane arrived.

Great European War Maps Free!

Showing All The Countries involved In The Most Gigantic Conflict Since The World Began. Two Large Colored Maps, Two Topographical Maps And Seven War Charts With Complete Facts And Figures Relating To The Great European War Of 1914!

COMFORT CAN now offer its readers the largest, most reliable, complete European War map yet published. In reality it is nine maps in one which fold up between stiff cardboard covers, 4¾ x 8½ inches, just the right size for the pocket. One large map 22½ x 28½ inches in size is printed in five colors and on its face shows the whole of Europe with all recent authentic changes in boundary lines including those brought about by the late Balkan war. It is as clear and smooth as steel engravings, all colors are distinct, all rivers and mountain ranges are clearly outlined. The face of the map also shows half-tone portraits of all the European rulers. On the reverse side of the map there is a wealth of data and information including a self-explanatory military and naval chart of Europe and a table showing the population, army and naval strength, aeroplane fleet, national debt, capital, name of ruler and area of each European country. In addition to this there is also a topographical map of German territory in China, a short history of the nations at war, history of the origin of the Triple Alliance and Triple Entente, history of the Hague International Peace Conference, accounts of the decisive battles of the last century in which European powers have been involved, coin values of all European money in United States money, a table of aeroplane distances between European cities and a table showing how to pronounce the names of different places which the war has brought to public attention.

There is also another large map 16½ x 18½ inches in size printed in two colors, showing all the war areas of Central Europe with half-tone portraits of European Army and Naval Commanders. The reverse side shows war charts of the ground plans of the five big European War capitals—London, Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg and Vienna—also population of each capital, a chart of the North Sea and Baltic Sea on which float the mighty navies of the warring nations, a chart of the frontier between France and Germany with the great French fortified cities of Belfort, Epinal, Toul and Verdun, also Liege in Belgium where the first great land conflict occurred, a topographical map of the Kiel Canal and surrounding country and a short concise history of the Canal.

With this big official war map at hand anybody can readily follow the daily changes as they transpire during the great conflict. The movements of armies and navies from point to point may be easily traced, the location of the different naval and land battles readily placed—in fact, this map is an absolute necessity if you would follow and understand the latest war news in the cable dispatches from abroad and which are published in the newspapers from day to day. We are now prepared to furnish a limited number of these European War maps to COMFORT readers and while our supply lasts we shall give them away on the terms of the following

FREE OFFER. For only one new 15-month subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, or for your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you this great European War Map exactly as described free by mail postpaid. Be sure to order early as our supply is limited. Premium No. 80.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

W. K., California, Mo.—The gladiatorial combats of Rome were considerably more destructive than beneficial, especially to the defeated gladiators if the audience turned their thumbs down which meant death. Gladiatorial combats continued in Rome for six hundred years, being abolished by Constantine, the Great, but revived under Constantius and continued under his two successors. Honorius finally ended them forever. Thousands of men were destroyed in these bloody combats.

Della, Little Rock, Ark.—Marriage of first cousins in Arkansas is illegal. In other words, it is not a marriage. No minister or magistrate would perform the ceremony if he knew the relationship. In Tennessee or Texas, two of your adjoining states, such a marriage would be legal. We advise you not to contract a marriage which has both civil and natural laws against it.

Mrs. R. M., Lyons, N. Y.—It is more difficult to sell a patent than it is to make the original invention, unless it happens to be one that will sell itself. If you have one that applies to some particular kind of machinery, advertise it in some journel of machinery, or write to firms who manufacture that particular machinery. You can do it at less expense and quite as successfully as the average agent would do it.

Miss M. R. P. K., Bowen, Ky.—The Panama Exposition opens February 20, 1915 and closes December 4, 1915. These dates were fixed before there were any immediate indications of a European war, and the directors announce that the Exposition will open just the same, war or no war. It will cost about fifty million dollars and will be worth going clear to California to see.

W. G. A., Lost Creek, W. Va.—Real swell dressers have the hose and scarf to harmonize in color with each other and may harmonize with the color of the suit, but that is secondary. Quiet dressers of good taste have all to harmonize, though hose and tie need not be of exactly the same color. With a dark coat and light trousers gray socks are in good taste, though any quiet color may be worn. A safe rule to follow in dress is to avoid anything that is conspicuous, either in whole or in part. Even a glaring tie may destroy the harmony of an ensemble, otherwise exactly what it should be. The Haberdasher, New York, is a magazine of men's styles. Write to it or to H. Malkan, No. 42 Broadway, New York City, for rates.

Mrs. S. S., Wooster, Ohio.—To you and to all COMFORT readers who have old furniture, china, silver, or other relics they wish to sell, we will say that dealers pay very small prices for such articles, except where they happen to be well-known makes and in demand, and the best customers for them are collectors who may want just what is offered and are willing to pay good prices. But nobody will buy "sight unseen," or by mere description, and the articles must be brought to public notice. That means they should be advertised in the nearest city papers where collectors have their homes. If they are interested they will write for further information and will arrange to see the articles if they want them. Mere age in these articles does not give great value, but a chair or a bedstead, a hundred years or more old, will sell for a good deal more than it brought when originally sold, if it is in good condition. So of the other old things, except books. First of all, though, in the matter of value are well-known brands of old-time makers who stood first in their own day.

C. M. D., Hallettsville, Texas.—A good waterproofing for shoe-leather is made of four ounces of beef tallow, an ounce of resin and an ounce of beeswax melted together. When cold add six ounces of neat's foot oil. Apply with a rag to soles and uppers, first warming them, and rub in with the hand. Two applications will make them waterproof, but at the same time they will be air tight and you will have your feet wet from perspiration and more chance to take cold than if you got your feet wet from the outside. Waterproof shoes should be worn only as rubbers are, that is, in the rain or snow, and not constantly. (2) Home treatment is of no value whatever, in the disease you mention. In fact, it makes it worse. Only a skilled physician can do any good. Deafness caused by typhoid fever or catarrh must be treated by a specialist.

L. D., Lincoln, Ark.—For information about homestead lands in the northwest, write to Commissioner of the Land Office, Washington, D. C., asking for detailed information if possible, along the lines you wish to know particularly about. No matter what you are told about lands by anybody, don't bind yourself to take any anywhere until you have seen them with your own eyes, or someone has gone to see them who knows exactly what you want.

E. W. B., Claire City, S. Dak.—There is a demand by some druggists for skunk oil, but it must be in sufficient quantity to justify shipment. If in small quantity the better way is to place it with a local dealer. Write Brewer Drug Co., Worcester, Mass. (2) Choosing a housewife is such a delicate matter and so very personal that we can only advise you to find a girl who wants to be your housewife and propose to her. Securing a wife and securing a hired girl are conducted along different lines.

Red Rose, Alma, Wis.—We suppose you mean by the "United States press" a post-office inspector as he investigates improper letter writing to be sent through the mails. If you know of improper letters being sent through the mails, notify the Postmaster General, Washington, D. C. who will refer it to the force of inspectors, as there are many of them.

D. L. L., Benton, Ky.—Railway mail clerks are under civil service and all information as to qualifications, examinations and so forth may be had by writing to Secretary Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

A. G. W., Newark, Ohio.—The hoop snake is wholly a creature of the imagination orginally started by the man who first told "snake stories."

Mrs. W. E. L., Supply, Ark.—The United States, the leading sugar consumer of the world, uses about three and a half million tons annually, or 81.3 pounds per capita. Of this it produces about a quarter million tons of cane and half a million tons beet, and seven thousand tons of maple. It imports from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines about nine hundred thousand tons and from Germany, India, West Indies and elsewhere about one and three quarter million tons. There isn't any one man who has cornered the sugar market, but several large manufacturers control the market without cornering it.

F. J. T., Keegan, Maine.—You are like most of the COMFORT readers who want to change their work and get at something which pays better—you ask us what you must do. That is not the way to succeed. The intelligent, active person doesn't ask what to do, but after he has found something and worked at it a while he asks advice as to how to improve his methods. You are intelligent and active and if you would study conditions around you and learn what your community needs that it will pay for, and cannot get except through some special means, an agent usually, you will take up some article or other, something of general household use, and get the agency for it. Keep your present job and work the other at night, or in any spare hours you have until you get it going, or prove that it is not worth working. Then try another and keep on trying till you find one that will pay to run it exclusively. When this is established, take on another and add others till you find that you can become agent for a number and can hire agents, on commission, you being the responsible head. COMFORT has very many advertisements of articles of the very kind you should begin with and we advise you to study its columns and pick out something that looks good to you as necessary in your community. Very little capital is required, except intelligence and activity. You've got to start yourself and if you wait for somebody else to do it, you will never get beyond being a hired man, liable to lose your job any minute. This agency business is only one way of becoming independent. We know a man who rented two acres of ground he used to look at from the railroad track where he was a walker, working as many hours a day as you do at about your pay, and today he is the leading florist and nurseryman in a town of eight thousand people and his hothouses are on the original two-acre plot where he started with nothing but intelligence and activity.

Mrs. L. W., Williamsport, Pa.—Write to Commissioner of Land Office, Washington, D. C. for information concerning land opened in the forest reservations in Oregon. Why will COMFORT readers insist upon writing to COMFORT for official information when they could save weeks of time by writing direct to the offices from which they must finally get their information? If they do not know the office to which they should write, any official or other intelligent person in their community can tell them.

Mr. M. H. Snider, Clarendon, Ark., wants to hear from COMFORT readers who live along rivers which produce mussell shells and fresh water pearls, particularly on the White river in Indiana. Also he wants to know what prices shells bring for buttons. Write direct to Mr. S. and not to COMFORT.

Miss M. B., Underwood, Minn.—We have frequent inquiries for the addresses of Woman's Exchanges and to all such inquirers let us say again, simply address your letters to "Woman's Exchange" in the city where you want to do business with it, your nearest city being usually the best for your purpose. Put your own address in the corner of the envelope so that your letter may be returned if not delivered, as all cities do not have Exchanges.

Mrs. R. C., Gerome, Wash.—If you have a good story send it to some magazine or other, first looking them over to see which one you think would be most likely to want your kind of a story. Enclose a stamped envelope for return if not wanted.

I. G., Waterbury, Nebr.—There are 330,603 Indians in the United States,—probably more than there ever were—and they are scattered all over the country. Oklahoma leads with 117,274; Arizona next with 41,505; New Mexico, 21,725; S. Dakota, 20,555; California, 16,513. Maine has 892, New Hampshire 34; Vermont, 26 and Delaware the least number of all, only five. Your own state has 3,890. There are 111 boarding-schools and 223 day schools supported by the government and 57 mission schools conducted by various religious denominations. For further particulars write to Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

Miss H., Blanchard, La.—We decline to give you the addresses of magazines which buy stories, for the reason that if you do not know which magazines buy stories you don't know enough about story writing to warrant your trying to write one, much less trying to sell it afterward. Other COMFORT readers with literary aspirations and nothing to back them but ignorance, please make a note of this. The magazines that publish stories are the ones that buy them, of course.

Miss L. B., Columbus, Ala.—We are very much pleased to learn of COMFORT girls studying domestic science, because not only they, but girls and women all over this land need more knowledge of this very useful science, but we are not pleased to have any of them ask us for the addresses of correspondence cooking schools, which we know nothing about, if any exist. A girl studying domestic science should learn enough from her studies and teachers to know about the best cooking school in such detail as we could not possibly give. The trouble with too many students is that they learn just what is put before them and nothing else and then they wonder why they can't do as good work as the student who learns all there is to know about the subject.

Mrs. R. R., Copan, Okla.—First cousins may marry in Texas. The states in which they cannot marry are Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Louisana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

Subscriber, Seneca, Mo.—Mothers' pensions laws are now in operation in California, Colorado, New Jersey, Washington, Utah, South Dakota, Idaho, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Missouri has no pension law yet, but Kansas City has been authorized by the state to adopt the system. Detailed information on this subject may be had from local county or town officials and a lawyer's services are not required as it is the object of the law to make its working as simple as possible. The laws vary in the different states.

Mrs. M. E., Noxapater, Miss.—The game of dominoes is a very pleasant and easy game for the old folks and the children and we can heartily recommend that every COMFORT family have it for household use after the day's work is done. A box of dominoes may be bought for as low as a quarter, or perhaps as low as ten cents. We cannot tell you so you will understand it, how to play the game, but the man you buy it from can show you in a minute, if directions do not accompany it.

A. G., Rowena, Texas.—It is not necessary to have your preparation patented, or registered under the Pure Food and Drug Act, but it is a protection and the registry gives it a certain authority it would not otherwise have. Write to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. for particulars.

H. H., Greenville, S. C.—Write to Librarian of Congress, Copyright Division, Washington, D. C. for information and blanks on securing copyright. You will be perfectly safe in sending to a publisher without copyrighting, and if he accepts it he will copyright it. You can sell it as well without copyright as with it, if it is what the publisher wants.

F. B., Gilmore, Idaho.—Diamonds will not burn except under intense heat. They will be ruined by any ordinary fire, which you can prove by dropping a fine one into the kitchen stove and letting it remain for fifteen minutes.

Back to the Farm

"Plenty of our young men and women, thousands of them, I may say, are getting away from the farms and going to the cities for better opportunities to make money," said the man who had on farmer's clothes and looked the part, "and yet it is the farm where the best money may be made if the youngsters will stick to it and do it right. Maybe their fathers couldn't make a go of it and had nothing when they died except the farm, but farming now isn't what it used to be. The total value of farm products for 1910 was very little short of nine billions of dollars, and a billion and a half of this was in corn. But corn doesn't pay like some other things that the farm raises. Take apples. We raise about 40 million barrels a year and it has gone as high as 68 million barrels. We send to foreign countries from a million and a half to three million barrels annually and the supply is far from the demand. Apple land in Oregon and the Northwest has increased 500 per cent in value, and in New York from $60 to $100 per tree is not unheard of. Trees that produce $50 a tree are numerous. But they don't grow apples on these farms as our grandfathers did. They do it in a businesslike manner. Eggs and chickens are other products that pay enormously when handled right. I know a farmer who has a thousand hens averaging 200 eggs a year, and gets 40 cents a dozen the year round for his eggs, that is to say, 17,000 dozen at 40 cents a dozen, amounting to $6,800. He has 150 acres and doesn't need the half of it. Another farmer with a good stream of water on his place has made reservoirs and is raising fish to the extent of about $2,000 a year and hardly got a start yet. Out West small fruit farms are worth from five hundred to a thousand dollars an acre and some apple and melon farms cannot be bought for three or four times that. It's all in the way they do it, and the young man or young woman, who thinks that life on the farm is not in it with life in the city, is making the one great mistake which can only be rectified right now. After a while it will be too late."

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

Comb and Brush

That Will Stand Long, Hard Use

The bristles of this brush are strongly embedded in aluminum-like, bright metal which has a silver luster, so they will stand no end of water without falling out or the back of the brush cracking.

We offer this special premium with confidence, knowing the most exacting people will be pleased to own a good brush and comb that will last for years and keep sweet and clean. The brush is nine inches long and two and one half inches wide of rich, black, ebonized finish, pure white, well filled, rows of bristles held firmly in place by the metal which prevents dust and germs from collecting around the bristles. Wet the brush and it cannot spoil or sour like ordinary ones. The comb, seven and one half inches long and one and one half inches wide, with fine and coarse teeth, and being made of special black secret process material, is well named Bull Dog or Unbreakable.

Cambric Underskirts

Two Of The Latest Styles

Take Your Choice

Free For A Club Of Four!

THESE two very attractive and stylish underskirts are made of fine quality cambric with flounces of muslin embroidery and come in sizes from 36 to 44 inclusive. The skirt shown at the top is made with a narrow flounce 6½ inches deep with a beading about one inch from the top of flounce through which is drawn pretty lingerie ribbon. The skirt shown at the bottom of the illustration has a 14½ inch flounce of handsome eyelet embroidery. Both these skirts are up-to-date in style and shape being cut along straight lines which give them the fashionable narrow effect now in vogue. The regular retail value of these skirts is one Dollar, but we are giving them away free on the terms of the following

Club Offer. For a club of only four 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-years subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either skirt free by Parcel Post prepaid. In ordering be sure to mention size also say whether you want skirt No. 694 or No. 695.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

THE summer is gone and the Summer Girls shiver, while Cupid's sharp arrows are froze in his quiver, at least, during November, which is really too dreary a month for flirting, though most of you, my dears, begin to chirk up a little by Thanksgiving and take hope again. I don't know what we would do with November if it weren't for Thanksgiving, and I believe it was set for this month just to relieve the dreariness. Still, after all, the gloom isn't really in the month so much as it is in ourselves, or will be if we let it get in, and we must make extra efforts to be cheerful and happy and make November ashamed of itself. Therefore I'm going to stop talking and get to work.

The first letter I take up is from Cousin Mercedes of Brooklyn, N. Y., who, after telling me how she loves her church and that I mustn't think she is conceited because she happens to be "given a gift of God to be good," devotes four pages of letter to the young men she admires and is admired by in the church and a few on the outside. I can only say to her that if she will think of the religion she professes instead of the young men who are trying to flirt with her in church she won't have to ask me so much about them.

Ater, Weston, W. Va.—A girl not quite nineteen surely need not worry which of two young men she should choose when neither is what she wants as a life partner. Treat them both nicely and wait three or four years for the right one. (2) It is quite proper to shut the door between your mother's room and that where you are receiving a caller.

Troubled, Moore, Okla.—I think when a girl of twenty-one works on the farm like a man and does housework like a woman she has earned the right to have company and enjoy the association of other young people and if you are independent and insist upon your rights your father will grant them and not keep you so closely at home. You need not be disobedient or disrespectful in the slightest. Simply say that you have earned that much pleasure in life and you intend to have it. Ask the young man to call for his scarf pin and if he is all right and as respectable as your father is, ask him to call again and when he asks you to go out with him, go. Children have rights that parents are bound to respect and the children should teach their parents, if they will not learn any other way.

N. E. D., Hillsdale, Va.—My dear, nobody marries, I fancy, without some little doubt whether they should or not, but they marry just the same and sometimes they laugh at their previous doubt, and sometimes they do not. You can only do as the others do, and if this very excellent young man wants to marry you and you are not sure you should marry him though you want to very much, then marry him and do all you can afterwards to dispel the doubt you had. You have my blessing to begin with. (2) It is not good form for the gentleman to send the lady a stamp for an answer in regular correspondence. (3) It is not at all necessary to send a present in return for one, though you may do so if you wish.

Dotty Dimple, Portland Oregon.—Until you are engaged to him, he has a perfect right to call on other girls and you are very foolish not to want him to do so. If he likes you well enough to have you for his "steady" that should be enough without forcing him to quit you entirely, or become engaged.

R. L., Mesquite, Texas.—Don't be asking me about the right or wrong way to kiss or be kissed. Cut out the kissing, my dear, and you won't have to be asking about it.

Troubled Beauty, Toshes, Va.—With the common school education you have and the nice young man waiting for you, I think, you can well afford to forego a college course and remain with your sick mother. But, my dear, you should learn to spell. Suppose you get good books and read to your mother, by which you may educate yourself along useful lines and also see how words are spelled correctly. You write: "I am in kneed of advice," and I give it to you. You also write: "I have all the luxeys of life," which should include a spelling book.

Brown Eyes, Hale, Mo.—Isn't the young man's friendship worth anything to you if he goes to see other girls, especially as he does not live near you? You have only a friendship claim on him, and why destroy that because he wants other friends. If I were the young man I wouldn't want your kind of friendship.

Beauty, Blaine, Wash.—You may be as pretty as the men say you are, but you are sillier than you are pretty if you will submit to the coarse attentions and familiarities of a married man because you don't want to make trouble by telling your own father, or the man's wife. You have every means of protection and if you will not use them, you deserve whatever happens.

Lolap, Elkins, W. Va.—Just keep the two beaus you have guessing, and in the meantime get a grammar and spelling-book and learn a whole lot of things you don't know now, especially the spelling. Does the beau you write to spell like you do?

Dolly, Van Buren, Ark.—Of course, if you are satisfied with him, go with him and marry him. A little thing like getting drunk and cursing you before people and setting the whole town talking, doesn't count for anything. After you become his wife he will get drunk and curse you so often that you will get used to it and the town will drop it as a subject not worth talking about. Still you say you love him and he loves you! Well, only the people who love each other should marry. So go ahead and marry him. I can stand it if you can.

Blue Eyes, Dale, Okla.—Really, cousin, I don't know how you can "win a nice respectfully boy's love," but I imagine if you would learn to use the English language properly, it might help some.

Indian, Davy, W. Va.—When a bashful youth who never goes with girls, hangs around one particular one all the time and is afraid to say anything, it is a sure sign he cares more for her than any other girl he knows.

Puzzled, Knox City, Tenn.—Holding hands, especially in buggy-riding, seems to be such a universal custom among young persons, that I think you should rather have laughed at the young man than to have been angry with him for trying to hold yours while you were driving with him. Whether it is right or wrong to hold hands, the custom is too firmly fixed, I think, to break it. Just the same, if you don't want your hand held, it is very easy for you to prevent it.

Gray Eyes, Santa Rosa, Cal.—Yes, my child, if the young man gets uncomfortable when you look at him and you get uncomfortable when he looks at you, I should guess that you are both in love. It often affects young people that way.

Broken-heart, St. Louis, Mo.—My dear, you have let your love lead you far astray, but there is yet time to come back to the fold, if you will only be brave enough and strong enough to conquer the bad and be guided by the good. I believe you can do this and if you will talk honestly and square to your sweetheart I believe he will help you in the struggle against yourself. You have done wrong, but it is not too late to do right and that you must do or be finally lost.

Ruth, Normal, Nebr.—There is no known way, my dear, of keeping the young man's love if he really doesn't care for you, though he may say he does, and is getting tired of you. What they think is love isn't love and is not warranted to keep. My advice to you is to call to your help all the good hard common sense you have and if he wants to leave you, let him go. If he really loved you he would at least stop chewing tobacco, though I think you might let him smoke. You mustn't be too exacting.

Blue Eyes, Leslie, Ga.—In your very uncertain state of mind and heart, I think you should not marry the young man who wants to marry you, nor the other young man you think you would like for a husband, but should prepare yourself for the work you can get in the city, with your aunt. In two or three years you will become more settled and have a broader view of life.

Bully, Manzanola, Colo.—Don't by any means lose such an exemplary and thrifty young man as this one is, but don't marry him until you are two years past seventeen, at least, and four would be better. By that time you will be sure of his love, if he will wait, and he will have more money at interest than he now has.

Forsaken, Havana, Fla.—If you and your sweetheart can't outwit your cruel stepmother who insists on having the children remain in the room when he calls, I don't think you deserve to win each other. Your love must be stupid if it can't find a way to commune together. If he is scared off by a little obstacle like this, I don't believe he is worth having.

Lassie, St. Petersburg, Pa.—You are as foolish as you think he is sensitive, if you will not speak to him of his lack of good manners and try to correct his etiquette for fear of hurting his feelings. If he is the excellent young man you say he is in other respects he will be only too glad to be corrected by a cultivated girl whom he likes. Don't be as silly as he is bad mannered. The good Lord gave women to men to smooth them out.

Beginner, Mammoth Springs, Ark.—A sixteen-year-old girl should not marry a twenty-year-old boy, whether some of his relations are respectable or not. Both of you wait five years before marrying each other or anybody else and you will be better prepared to assume the responsibilities of marriage.

Western Girl, Gildford, Mont.—One day in the week is quite as good to marry on as another, even Sunday, when ordinary contracts are not legal. It isn't the day in the week, it is yourself, that makes marriage worth having. (2) Before two people marry they should know everything about each other that could possibly make any kind of trouble between them after they are married. Many marriages are made unhappy, or broken up entirely, by withholding personal information which should have been communicated beforehand, especially in regard to health. (3) The best way to get around the word "obey" in the marriage service is to be married by a service that does not contain it. But don't worry about it. Most women obey to suit themselves when they are wives.

Would-be-happy, Canton, Kans.—Some young people, of both sexes, have a way when in love of continually insisting that the other one doesn't love as they do and a lot more of the same kind of silly suspicion. I don't know why they do it and I don't believe they do. If I were you I would tell the young man to stop talking like that, or I wouldn't have anything more to do with him.

There, my dears, your questions have been answered and I hope you are all perfectly satisfied; if they are not exactly what you expected they are better for you in some instances than if they had been the way you wanted them. You see I am trying to help you, even though I have to scold you occasionally. Now take my advice to heart, all of you, and let it be a help to you and the good Lord hold us all in His hand. By, by.

spores, which affect all parts of the bird's body and the air-tubes. Often sneezing and a discharge from the nostrils lead people to think that they have cases of roup, or at least a roupy cold to deal with. Your neighbors' birds may be in an advanced state of the same disease, but I rather think that they have roup of the eyes, which frequently develops lumps just under the eye, varying in size from a hazel-nut to a hickory-nut. For your own birds I advise the following treatment: Make tar water by dissolving two tablespoonfuls of wood tar in a quart of warm water. Remove the birds to some small, tightly-built house or room. Place a very hot brick in a pan half filled with ashes and pour a little of the tar water on the brick, using a little at a time to keep up a vapor until the air of the house or room is heavily charged with it. It is well to treat all the flock at once if possible, as by that means the fear of contagion is checked. The house in which the birds have been roosting must be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected, especially water and feed dishes. Your neighbors would do well to follow the same advice, supplemented by personal treatment for each really sick bird. Tell them to make a lotion of half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the lotion with three of water, and spray the bird's nostrils, mouth, throat and eyes. If you have no regular spray, a small syringe or a medicine dropper will answer the purpose. To prevent contagion the bird should be quarantined.

T. W. N.—Will you please tell me the disease of my chickens. The chickens were eight weeks old when they took the disease. Their backs seem weak and their legs also. Their legs seem to dwindle away and their hips are a dark greenish color. They have good appetites and seem to grow some. They stand up straight, and their tails drag around. They have had free range on wheat stubble and grass and weeds. Have fed corn-meal mixed up wet, and wheat also. My neighbors' chickens are in same shape.

A.—The condition you describe puzzles me. The fact that you say the skin of the hips turned a dark green color, and the shanks shrunk, and that they carry themselves in an upright position, suggests poison and inflammation of the crop. But you don't say that there is any diarrhea, which is usually present in such cases. However, I think that the best thing I can recommend you to do, is to give the birds Castor oil, which will clear out the intestines and relieve any pressure in the crop. Mix it with the morning mash, allowing about three tablespoonfuls to each bird.

Austrian Bead Necklace

The Latest Imported Novelty In Necklaces For 1914

This Is "THE" Style This Season. Don't Fail To Send For One.

Hand Made From Strings Of Beautiful White Austrian Beads Woven Together And Finished With Handsome Imit. Amethyst And Gold Bead Decorated Pendant.

Bead necklaces are more fashionable than ever this season. For the last two or three years these handsome, inexpensive neck ornaments have been steadily growing in popular favor and now the style has become so firmly established that no lady or girl can really call herself "up-to-date" in dress unless she is wearing one of them. The most beautiful necklaces come from Austria where they are hand made by skilled workmen who first string the beads in single strand then cleverly weave the strands together in different ways producing many varied handsome effects. The style shown here was the prettiest one we found among a dozen different samples submitted for our approval so we have purchased a large quantity of them and are going to distribute them free among our readers. It consists of three strands of pure white Austrian beads woven together so as to form a single strand which fastens with gold-plated clasp and in the center there is attached as a pendant a smaller double strand of beads decorated with a beautiful large imit. Amethyst, an imit. gold bead and a large pear-shaped bead at the extreme end. This necklace when unclasped is 15 inches in length while the lower part, or pendant, is 2½ inches in length. The real beauty of this handsome new necklace does not appear in our illustration but we hereby guarantee that every lady or girl who receives one from us on this offer will be more than delighted with it. Be sure to read the following free offer then send in your order today.

For One Subscription!

Send us only one new 15-months subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents or your own subscription, renewal or extension of present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) and we will mail you free and postpaid this beautiful and stylish Austrian Bead Necklace exactly as above illustrated and described. Premium No. 679.

going many miles to see. The entire country is beautiful in the spring when tiny flowers dot these majestic mountains with such riot of color that it makes me long to be able to gather them for those who love flowers and are unable to get them. The United States General Hospital is situated just above Bath House Row and is also owned and controlled by the Government. It is a pretty, clean place with beautiful grounds and spacious buildings. How I wish I could send thousands of gallons of this pure, hot water to the many suffering ones that are bent with rheumatism and suffering from stomach troubles and various diseases that these waters are known to cure.

We have taken dear old COMFORT since I was a child and could not do without it now.

How many sisters have tried plain salt water for falling hair? I have found it very effective.

Mrs. Barker, I agree with you, be kind to the old people, remember we will be old ourselves some day; so please be kind and thoughtful of them.

Mrs. Wilkinson, I can think of nothing nicer than to have you for a neighbor, always so ready to give good advice, just as patient and sweet as can be. You certainly have my best wishes in your big but grand work. If I have not worn my welcome out may I come again sometime? Will be glad to hear from the sisters.

MRS. NAN BROOKS.

Mrs. Brooks. You certainly are welcome to come again, as is everyone, for we shall all be interested in a further description of the wonders surrounding you. Truly, God's work is evident everywhere and if any unbelievers come to the Springs for treatment, the wonder-working powers must be more convincing to them than any sermon ever preached, and they can go on their way, stronger in faith as well as bodily strength. I only wish it were possible for me to know personally, all the sisters with whom I have become acquainted through the medium of Uncle Sam; though I sometimes wonder if I would be a disappointment to them.—Ed.

NUCLA, COLO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I venture to write again after nearly a year's delay? I, too, am like Mrs. F. A. Wilson, not very large, am five feet six inches tall, brown eyes and dark brown hair and tip the scales at just ninety-five pounds. Mrs. Wilson I, too, think it wrong to lie to children but of course a mother meets with some very perplexing questions from children, but when they do they should not lie to them, just tell them they are too young to know just then but when they grow older they shall know.

My baby isn't old enough to know these things; is only seventeen months old and is just walking.

Mrs. Proctor, you spoke of giving baby sweet cream, also pure olive oil three times a day. I gave her pure olive oil and thanks to it, for today I have a good, well baby in that respect. But whenever she catches the least bit of cold her bowels get disordered.

I am interested in the letter which says a girl ought to teach at least one term of school before marriage. I never taught school but since then I have wished I had, for I agree with Mrs. Wilson that there is always a dark side of life no matter what profession you follow.

I am twenty-two and married when twenty years old. Our home has been one of the happiest but I never was strong or well and tire easily. Sometimes I just wanted to throw up my hands and quit, but there was my husband, he is always so good to me. When I am tired he comes in from his work and helps get dinner or whichever meal it happens to be; then, too, my little baby needed my attention so there I was. I just had to work. Several of the sisters were so kind to offer their advice in regard to my baby's sickness and I greatly appreciated it, too, and meant to reply to those who wrote.

I think COMFORT is just the grandest paper. I hope its good work goes on forever.

Enclosed is a recipe for a cake, but it must be mixed just right or it won't be quite so nice.

Wishing everyone of the readers and Mr. Gannett and Mrs. Wilkinson success, MRS. FLOYD WINKFIELD.

OXFORD, MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I seldom see a letter from Maine in "our corner," so thought I would break the ice, and send one, even if it wasn't very good. I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for a long time and think it the best ever. I always find many helpful things in each number. There were so many fine things in the July number. I want especially to speak of Mrs. Barnes' letter. I fully agree with her, if we can say no good of a person we can at least keep still, and if we see a fellow creature on the downward road, instead of giving them a push we can reach out a helping hand. I have always found the Golden Rule a good one to follow, "do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." I believe in doing all the good we can and whenever we can and I try to practise what I preach. There are so many little ways of helping others, even if we are poor, if we watch for the chance.

I want to say to the Western sisters, that while they have many advantages in their states which we do not have, that after all Maine is a grand old state.

Now sisters, I want to ask a big favor of you. I would like to receive not only one, but a lot of letters from every state in the Union, and I will surely answer.

I have been a widow for fifteen years, no near relatives, except one girl with whom I make my home. I have been in poor health for eight years and often feel lonely, so letters are most welcome. I have one dear little grandson, a little over two years old. What a comfort children are! Some call them "troublesome comforts," but I do not think so. Now for a few helps:

If your sink drain becomes clogged, invert a cup over the opening and move it rapidly up and down for a few moments; it will clear it at once.

In making apple sauce, before you sweeten it add a tiny pinch of soda and as soon as it is done foaming, sweeten it, does not take nearly as much sugar, and with the high price of sugar now, it is worth saving.

Now sisters, if I am fortunate enough to have this printed I shall look for lots of letters and I hope I won't be disappointed. With love to you all and a loving "God bless you all," I am your COMFORT sister, MRS. A. F. THOMPSON.

Mrs. Thompson. It is some months since we have printed a letter from a Maine subscriber. I hope that more of our Maine readers will follow your example, and write good letters to our Sister's Corner, not only expressing their opinions on current topics but also describing their families, their surroundings, their manner of life and the advantages they enjoy in their respective communities, as do so many of those who write me from the West and South. Maine is a good place to work in, for you can work and yet enjoy life here. The people of Maine—they average as well as any anywhere—are intelligent, industrious, prosperous and happy, as a rule, but seem content to enjoy their advantages in silence without trying to boom their state or their respective localities.—Ed.

MONROE, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

This is from a sister in New York State, who is knocking for admission. May I come in? I shan't stay long as I am very busy.

I think it would be a good idea if people, corresponding with each other, would mention COMFORT, I believe it would be a good fellowship bond, and would insure an answer.

I am twenty years old, five feet eight inches tall, weigh one hundred and fifty pounds, brown hair and eyes, and may I add good natured. I have been married three years and have two children, a girl two years and a boy nine months old. Also I want to say I have a good husband. He doesn't drink or swear, is kind and loving and spends his evenings home with me and the children. I am as much in love with him as ever, but now I hear some sisters say that I am not past that silly age yet. I feel quite rich with such a good husband and the babies and I am thankful too.

I do all the sewing for my family and make patchwork and embroidery, besides doing all the housework. The time speeds far too quickly for me. I sing as I work and find work a pleasure. It all depends on a person's mood they are in as to the work they have to do. Think clean, cheery thoughts and you will be surprised how quickly the "blues" will go. One can't stay all day in a pint measure. By that I mean, we have so much work to do and only a certain time to do it in, so we can't spend all the time on one thing but do much as can be done in a day. I had a young lady friend, stopping with me, who had a baby. She had her baby spoiled. She held it on her knee continuously and would say, "let that go till tomorrow," and "the first baby is always spoiled." I hope there are very few people who think that way. We shouldn't allow ourselves to become lazy and above all we shouldn't spoil the babies. If we don't set an example for the children, we can't expect our children to be ideals of the perfect childhood and later manhood and womanhood. Now, I don't mean to even think my children are perfect either, for I am only trying to do my best and bring them up properly and to live for what is right.

It fills one's heart with pity for so many of the young girls who are victims of the white slavers who go wrong through the "blindness of virtue." Mothers should tell their daughters certain things at a certain age when they can understand; many tragedies would be avoided if mothers would assume this responsibility and swallow their mock modesty before it is too late. If girls were taught to shun every strange man, not allowed to read "dime" novels, they wouldn't imagine every man a possible "Prince Charming." A little time spent in teaching them sewing and cooking would help them to be useful women and wives when the right one comes along.

Can someone do me a favor and tell me what will rid the hair of dandruff? Love to all the COMFORT sisters, I am, sincerely yours, through COMFORT,

MRS. HARRY BENJAMIN.

COTTONWOOD, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS ONE AND ALL:

Here comes a sister from eastern Oregon to tell you that I am one with you. I have taken COMFORT for quite a while and I never will be without it is long as I live. It does me much good to read your letters, they are so full of helpful things.

May God bless those that take little children in their homes. There is nothing makes a home so happy as little children. I have one dear little boy fifteen months old. He is a world of company to us.

At present this is mostly a stock country, but some farming is done as well. It is a good fruit country in some places. It is too cold to raise tender fruit, but the hardy fruit does fine and no better vegetables are grown anywhere. Grain also does well, our soil is the very best, we don't use anything on our land to make it produce. Land is selling very cheap here, too. There is one thing we need bad and that is a market, but I suppose that will soon come.

What do you sisters say about a Badge Pin for our corner? I think it would be nice to have a pin representing our corner.

I have read so many requests for remedies for rheumatism that I am sending a tried and true remedy. To

A. M.—Certainly, I will be glad to print directions for banishing blackheads, as they certainly are a great trial. Don't grow discouraged, as daily treatment will soon rid you of this beauty defect. First, never forget to bathe the face at night, before retiring, using hot soapy water and a complexion brush. When the face is cleaned and has been rinsed free of soiled lather, dry the skin and rub over the face a handful of boric powder. If this smarts the skin unduly, massage in a little cold cream. Once a week after the face has had its nightly bath, steam it over a basin of boiling water, then rinse in hot water and spread over the face a handful of soap jelly. After ten minutes wash this off and massage with a good cream for several minutes. On this night omit the boric powder.

Soap Jelly

Pare one cake of Castile soap into three cups of water, to which has been added one teaspoonful of powdered borax. Boil until mixture jellies. Put in covered glass jar and use as wanted. Always wash face in hot water and finish by dashing on cold water.

When your face is free from blackheads it is time to use an astringent wash, as the tiny pores will need to be contracted. I am giving formula for a pore contractor below:

Astringent for Coarse Pores

Tincture of benzoin, one ounce; juice of cucumbers, four drams; cologne, four drams; elder-flower water, sixteen ounces.

Bertha.—The hair should be washed every ten days if extremely oily. If dry and fluffy once every six weeks will be sufficient. Do not dampen the hair when combing or brushing it. If you keep up this practise you soon won't have any hair to comb. Healthy hair should be left alone. If your scalp itches or the hair is thin or falling out, massage scalp for twenty minutes every day with the following pomade:

Hair Ointment

White vaseline, three ounces; Castor oil (cold drawn), one and one half ounces; gallic acid, one and three quarter drams; oil of lavender, thirty drops.

Push the scalp to and fro with the finger-tips and occasionally knead it deeply, using a rotary movement. If the hair splits it generally means that the scalp is in need of nourishment. Of course all split ends must be cut off if you expect the hair to grow longer. I hope I have given you the information you needed.

Miss M. L. K.—Rub ankles heavily with toilet water for twenty minutes a day. This will break down the fatty tissues and the ankles should grow beautifully less.

Mollie.—I would recommend using the preparation mentioned by you, peroxide of hydrogen bleaches the hair to invisibility and at the same time rots the root. Dampen the hair daily with peroxide. If the extra hairs grow only around the ears I do not think it would irritate the skin to dampen the growth with aqua ammonia or camphor every other day. Do this for a long time, say eight or nine months, and the hairs should fall out. Remember to apply the peroxide once daily and the ammonia every other day. Use the same treatment for hairy arms.

Dolly.—Stop using the cream mentioned. Cocoa-butter makes a better flesh builder. If you would make a point of drinking two quarts of creamy milk every day you would soon see an improvement. Massage with oily substances will plump the shoulders but slowly. The milk piles the flesh on rapidly.

Rose.—I really think you should use a dye, if your eyebrows are really white. Massaging them with yellow vaseline will slightly darken them.

Helen.—A dimple is a most natural desire and to bring about this result, you must press the blunt end of a new penholder into your cheek for fifteen minutes, after which coat dimple with white of egg, then apply plenty of powder. If you do this four times each day for several months, your dimple will come to stay.

Genevieve.—Probably you don't know that peroxide of hydrogen, in addition to making a good antiseptic mouth wash, bleaches yellow teeth to a milky whiteness. I advise you to try this simple tooth bleacher.

Emma.—Perhaps your hands are red because you wear your clothing a trifle snug. If the belts, collars, cuffs, corsets and sleeves—especially the armholes—are an easy fit there will not be so much probability of red hands. You should drink from eight to ten glasses of cool water a day and take a cold sponge bath upon arising in the morning. Several times during the day hold your hands underneath a stream of cool water.

Comfort's League of Cousins

times. Do you know my dear, when I received my birthday letters last year (and there were thousands of them) at least half the writers, and especially the women, asked me the same question you have done. Women quickly sense wrong and injustice where men don't. They are worried as to the future of their children. Men as a rule are not. "Oh," says the man, "I had to take a chance, my kids will have to do the same." The woman worries. She knows there is something wrong, she knows the world is out of joint. Order is God's first law and women crave a well-ordered world, where peace, justice, prosperity and plenty reign, and where children can bloom and flower without the blight of want, suffering, poverty and pollution. The dull witted who want to keep the ballot out of women's hands so that the poor darlings can't be sullied by the smirch of politics, heedless of the fact that no woman has to go into politics to cast a vote, forgetful too of the fact that a woman suffers just as much from rotten politics in her home without the ability to improve conditions, as any other member of society, and has as much right to alter conditions which are intolerable to her, as a man has to alter conditions which are intolerable to him. To hear superficial thinkers talk you would imagine as long as a woman had some old ramshackle joint that could be called a home, with some tobacco-chewing male to boss the ranch, she ought to be perfectly contented, even if her life was one long round of toil and drudgery, child bearing and child raising. I did not intend however, to talk about suffrage now. I merely touched on the point so that you may know that women in the mass would, if given the opportunity, clean up this old world of ours and put it in order. When streets in our cities get unspeakably vile, it is the women who come out with mops and brooms and clean them up just to shame the men. The great world cleaner however, is the ballot. Not until women get that broom in their hands will they accomplish anything worth while. The women of Illinois closed up a thousand saloons the other day, and they did it as easy as rolling off a log, while without the ballot they might have talked a thousand years, without getting one rum joint closed. A woman is naturally spiritual, and when you hear something clicking in her inside you'll know it's a heart and not a cash register, and you won't have to shovel any tainted money from her cranium to get at her conscience. Men would do better if they knew better, but the very things men ought to know are the very things they know nothing about. You won't find one man in a thousand who knows anything about political economy or economics. You see men with newspapers in their hands. They peep at them at the breakfast table, get a squint at them on the crowded car. At night after dinner they may spend an hour with newspapers or magazines. I'm talking now of the prosperous, well-educated business men, and if you look over their shoulders while they are reading, you will find they are studying Wall Street stock quotations, and the one or two things that concern business and dollars, and at the best they will only give a glimpse at the headlines, though they won't miss many lines of the spicy divorce cases which appear with unfailing regularity in all our morning prints. The ordinary man cannot conceive of a world in which he won't have to rush to business and rush home again. His check book is his Bible, the dollar is his god. His pet aversion and haunting horror is his pay roll. As long as he can keep his pay roll down to what he thinks it ought to be, he'll admit that life has some splendid spots, but there is always the dread that those who are on his payroll may want another fifty cents a week and that might mean one automobile less, an income cut from a hundred thousand a year to seventy-five thousand. As to how the men or women live who roll up his profits he concerns himself not at all. His daughters are well chaperoned and well provided for, the white slave traffic doesn't get them, so why should he worry. Business begets selfishness. There is nothing altruistic about business. It is a game of grab, and the man who is most ruthless in the grabbing game is the man whose name is on every tongue. Men may not admire his methods, but they envy him his cash. Yes, we live in a business world, and business is a Moloch that tramples all underfoot who are not swift and slick in a business way. I am living in a business world, so are you. When you are in Rome, they say, you must do as Rome does. In other words if people in Rome steal, you must steal too. If Romans lie you must lie. I however simply decline to subscribe to any such Satanic doctrine. I'm in a business world but I am not of it, in fact I loathe and despise it, for it is the world that stifles the best in humanity and brings out only the worst. It is a world in which the slickest, and not the fittest survive. It is a world of exploitation, a world not of humans but of squirrels and nuts. I don't want to be a predatory squirrel, neither do I want to be an exploited nut. I believe God put men on earth for something higher, something nobler and finer than to make profit out of one another. A business world crushes all the finer sensibilities out of men and in consequence we have to have governments which spend all their time in inventing checks and passing laws that will keep dog from eating dog, the more powerful man of dollars from swallowing the less powerful man of dimes. What a noble occupation for the elected representatives of the nation! Men being born into this kind of a world and having to get their living in this kind of a world and not having imagination enough to conceive any nobler, higher better kind of a world, strive madly either to be predatory squirrels or give up the struggle and resignedly become exploited nuts. Newspapers and magazines, being also business propositions, are careful to print nothing that will disturb the inflow of profits, in fact they cannot say anything without antagonizing the more powerful business interests and to antagonize them would be to invite destruction. Many magazines have been forced out of existence and their proprietors sent to bankruptcy because those who owned and controlled them revolted at present-day conditions and tried to expose the rottenness that existed and still exists in every avenue of our national life. Men having no imaginations of their own are unable to do any thinking unless some seeds of thought are dropped into their brains by men who like myself, try to live on the heights where the glory of God and His universe can be glimpsed and not in the misty valleys where men struggle in the morasses of their greed and selfishness, trampling the weaker underfoot and making life a nightmare of torture for the many. Nothing can be accomplished without thinking, not everyday thinking, but right thinking. Nearly every man thinks in a rut, just as gold fish if they are taken out of a bowl and put in a stream of water will still continue to revolve in the narrow circle to which they have been accustomed. Every man thinks of himself and is buried in the miserable depths of his own selfish interests. He never realizes the glory and grandeur of thinking for others and of caring for and worrying for others. He is the human chicken who never pecked his way through his miserable shell. The masses as a whole never see or read a progressive paper. The nation has been divided up into two political camps and instead of all men working together for national good the powers of wealth and privilege keep the voting element arrayed against each other ever warring with each other and so precious time, in which millions die miserably is spent, in which Mr. Tweddle Dee Democrat tries to convince Mr. Tweddle Dum Republican that he is several kinds of an idiot and does not know how to run a country, and Mr. Tweddle Dum Republican retorts to Mr. Tweddle Dee Democrat in the same strain. As a matter of fact neither of those old parties care at heart whether the masses of the people have a crust to eat or a place to lay their heads. They are well paid, why should they worry? The world will advance, not by any efforts made by these parties, but in spite of them. The great majority of the people

Sore Teeth Diseased Gums

My Book Sent Free Tells All About It

Why Suffer Any Longer?

I offer to you, dear reader, a wonderful, new, simple and painless method of treatment at home for these affections. With this new treatment you can save the teeth nature gave you, make your mouth healthy and escape the torture and expense of false teeth. It is simple, easy and pleasant. Besides, it is painless and cannot possibly harm you in any way.

Showing how the gums recede and the teeth finally drop out. Look in the mirror and see if YOUR teeth are now in this condition. If so I am sure you will welcome the opportunity I offer you and write me at once for further particulars.

Stop Despairing. Don't Give Up Hope of Saving Your Teeth

Write me today and learn more about this new and easy method that you can use at home so there will be no further need for you to undergo the long, painful or expensive dental treatment. Bridges, crowns and false teeth are unsightly and rarely satisfactory, and through this treatment of the causes of bad and sensitive teeth, gum disease and foul breath, they should be unnecessary.

Why wait until your case gets to this pitiful state?

If you are suffering with Pyorrhea or Riggs Disease, gingivitis, receding gums, elongated or loose teeth, soft, discolored or spongy gums; if your breath is foul, if your teeth pain while eating; if you are subject to bad tastes—then, for your own sake, send for my book and learn how easy this method is—how painless and speedy—how it will quickly and permanently give you sound, healthy teeth.

Don't wait. There is no pain connected with it. I have received scores of letters from people saying they would have given hundreds of dollars had they known of my home method in time.

Merely ask for my book and it will be sent at once, together with full information and the names and addresses of hundreds of people who have used it and found such blessed relief—all FREE and without obligation of any kind. Use letter, postal or this coupon at once.

If you suffer in any way whatever with sore teeth or gums, you should learn what I am doing for hundreds of others every day, and read the interesting and valuable little book I have published free for the benefit of all sufferers.

Read These Remarkable Letters

What I have done for these people and hundreds of others, I can no doubt do for you.

Stopped His Bleeding Gums

Your method is certainly satisfactory and beyond my expectations. My gums quit bleeding second or third day. Apparently new gums growing up next to my teeth. My teeth are a cleaner white than before and do not hurt me when I eat. If I had known you 10 years ago and taken your kind advice, no doubt I would have all my teeth today, and sound ones, too. Anyone doubting your ability to treat teeth you may refer to me. I will tell them what you have done for me.—Frank C. Giffen, Oakland, Kans.

Saved Her Teeth

I am so sorry I did not know of you ten years ago before I had so many teeth pulled out. You may be sure I will tell everyone about what good it has done me.—Mrs. Jennie Burgess, Bloomfield, Iowa.

Says Wonderful Cure

I am writing to tell you of the wonderful cure. My teeth are firm and feeling fine. I am so happy. I thank you again and will speak a good word to my friends about you and your treatment.—Mrs. A. A. Castle, 21 Hazzard St., Jamestown, N. Y.

Cured Him and His Mother

Joe L. Duclas, Prairie du Roches, Ill., writes: "Your method cured me as well as my mother of very sore mouths."

Hundreds of others have written me the same way. I have had 21 years' experience and know what you want is a quick and painless method of relief and I offer it to you now. It is foolish and ignorant to put off when so much is at stake. Take your pen or pencil and write me now—today.

Things the Modern Farmer Must Know

silage in the sound silage and it will soon thaw out. If this is done the affected silage may safely be fed to cattle, but it would be best not to give it to horses. They are more liable to damage from frosted or slightly moldy silage than are cows. If the frosted silage is allowed to remain stuck to the sides of the silo for months so that it freezes and thaws alternately it will be likely to become moldy and so prove dangerous. Some farmers allow the frosted silage to stick to the sides of the silo until spring when it thaws and falls down. Then they throw the silage into the cattle yard and allow horses and cattle to eat it. When this is done some of the silage is sure to become badly molded in the yard and such silage is liable to kill horses from cerebro-spinal meningitis or "forage poisoning." Use the frosted silage right along, after thawing it out before it becomes moldy, and no ill effects will result.

FROSTED BEET TOPS.—Such damaged leaves cannot safely be fed while frozen, but if they are thawed out by drenching with cold water and are then fed as a part ration with plenty of sound hay they will do no harm. Another good way to handle these beet tops is to pile them and before severe frost run them and shocked corn through the silage cutter and into the silo. At the Wisconsin station it has been found that they make good feed when so treated. There is no need of letting tops go to waste and they are of comparatively little value as fertilizing material. Sheep eat them as a part ration along with hay, grain and wheat bran or oilcake.

FROSTED CORN FODDER.—Such fodder has in the first place lost at least fifty per cent of its feeding value from weathering in the field and in the second place it is not fit feed when frosted. When thawed out it is safe, if not moldy, and if fed as a part ration with good hay. Do not feed it to pregnant mares. It may cause abortion. It is best to get the corn fodder into the shed, or stack it as a windbreak about the stock yard, and feed it as we have just suggested. Corn fodder should not stand out and waste all winter.

The same growers who have in the past furnished COMFORT'S famous rose collections are to supply us with these ferns each one of which is guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. Owing to lack of space we are able to illustrate here only one variety. "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer each one of which we will briefly describe to you as follows, although no description can convey to you any real idea of their rare beauty.

The "Roosevelt"

This is a new variety recently introduced and one of the finest ferns for house decorative purposes ever grown, of compact vigorous growing habit producing in great numbers wide massive fronds of good length beautifully tapered from base to tip and drooping gracefully over the pot hiding it completely from view. The pinnæ, or leaves, of this magnificent fern are distinctively undulated giving the whole plant a most beautiful wavy appearance. The "Roosevelt" has without exception proved to be the strongest growing fern ever produced and seems to withstand better than any other variety the most unfavorable conditions, while if it is given ordinary care it quickly develops into a specimen of rare beauty.

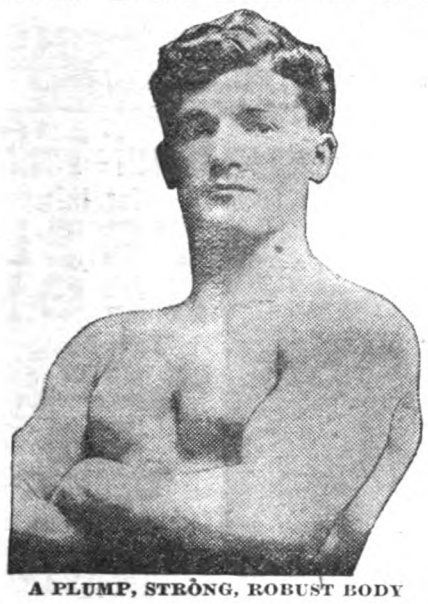
The "Whitmani"

This charming creation has caused a real sensation among lovers of plants, each frond being as delicate and finely cut as the most perfect ostrich plume by which name this fern is commonly known. It is a very vigorous grower constantly unfolding new fronds from six to eight inches wide of fine feathery foliage entirely distinct from any other variety quickly growing to a width of from ten to twelve inches and of such good substantial texture that it withstands the abuse to which house plants are sometimes subjected. The "Whitmani" is one of the few feathery foliage ferns which everyone can succeed in growing to a superb finished specimen even under the most unfavorable conditions of soil and treatment.

The "Asparagus Plumosus"

There is always a place in every home for this magnificent fern for it is one which really adapts itself to all conditions making the most rapid and vigorous growth with the least care and attention. Its bright, rich green fronds are as fine and delicate as the most beautiful lace by reason of which it is sometimes given the name "lace fern." The rapid sturdy growth of this fern combined with its exquisite lacy foliage makes a plant of such airy grace and value as to be desired by everyone.

"The Boston"



This fern is one of the oldest and best known varieties grown and in the long years of its growth has proved well worthy of a place in every home. It is known by some as the "Fountain Fern" which name is derived from its graceful drooping habit of growth and until the recent production of the "Roosevelt Fern" was acknowledged the finest of its type. It is a very rapid grower producing fronds frequently measuring from six to eight feet long and its freedom of growth without special care has made this fern extremely popular with all who admire beautiful house plants.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only two 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you by Parcel Post prepaid the above described collection of four beautiful ferns each one of them a strong, healthy, well rooted plant, ready to pot and guaranteed to grow and develop into a fine specimen beauty. Premium No. 611. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

People Used to Call Me "Skinny"

But Now My Name Has Changed. Gained 15 Pounds and

Look Like a New Man

A PLUMP, STRONG, ROBUST BODY

"Before I took Sargol people used to call me 'skinny' but now my name is changed. My whole body is stout. Have gained 15 pounds and am gaining yet. I look like a new man," declared a man who had just finished the Sargol treatment.

"I was all run down to the very bottom," writes F. Gagnon. "I had to quit work, I was so weak. Now, thanks to Sargol, I look like a new man. I gained 22 pounds in 23 days."

"Sargol has put 10 pounds on me in 14 days," states W. O. Roberts. "It has made me sleep well, enjoy what I ate and enabled me to work with interest and pleasure."

Would you too, like to quickly put from 10 to 30 pounds of good, solid "stay-there" flesh, fat and muscular tissue between your skin and bones?

Don't say it can't be done. Try it. Let us send you free a 50c package of Sargol and prove what it can do for you.

More than half a million thin men and women have gladly made this test, and that Sargol does succeed, does make thin folks fat even where all else has failed, is best proved by the tremendous business we have done. No drastic diet, flesh creams, massage, oils or emulsions, but a simple, harmless home treatment. Cut out the coupon and send for this free package today, inclosing only 10 cents in silver to help pay postage, packing, etc.

Address The Sargol Co., 12-Z Herald Bldg., Binghamton, N. Y. Take Sargol with your meals and watch it work. This test will tell the story.

FREE SARGOL COUPON

Cured His RUPTURE

I was badly ruptured while lifting a trunk several years ago. Doctors said my only hope of cure was an operation. Trusses did me no good. Finally I got hold of something that quickly and completely cured me. Years have passed and the rupture has never returned, although I am doing hard work as a carpenter. There was no operation, no lost time, no trouble. I have nothing to sell, but will give full information about how you may find a complete cure without operation, if you write to me. Eugene M. Pullen, Carpenter, 460A Marcellus Avenue, Manasquan, N. J. Better cut out this notice and show it to any others who are ruptured—you may save a life or at least stop the misery of rupture and the worry and danger of an operation.

Throw Your VOICE!

Genuine Weatherproof Garment

Utility Coat for Ladies, Misses and Men

Fashioned after the model of a "Great Coat," it covers the entire person from "Head to Foot," affording complete protection from the weather, be it wind or rain. Made of waterproof rubber sheeting, in two colors, Olive Drab or Tan and Gray with Plaid Lining, every seam is both sewed and cemented, has standing Military Collar, two side pockets and five large buttons.

For walking the coat is none too heavy, for riding it is the greatest rain and wind repellant imaginable.

Of late the so-called "rain coat" has been all the rage, they have proven more desirable than so-called cravenetted materials, being lighter in weight.

Every person, especially schoolgirls, should be amply protected from the weather, and this coat provides a garment that covers all the outer clothes, providing warmth and keeping everything dry. Such coats usually sell for $5.00 but we can give them away free for small subscription clubs as we have bought a quantity at great advantage. Read the offer carefully. Premium No. 530.

Club Offer. Send only 12 subscribers to COMFORT at 25c. each for 15 months for one Coat; same will be sent at our expense. You may select Tan or Gray, and please give size, bust measure, required. Address

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

G. W. H., Freeland, Md.—Adenoids in children produce many symptoms and in some instances almost indicate idiocy, with its slobbering and inability to talk intelligibly. As to enlarged tonsils, they can be determined only by examination. As the three doctors who have seen the child disagree, we would advise that you take her to Johns Hopkins Hospital at Baltimore, where whatever the physicians say may be relied upon and if cure is possible it will be effected. Great progress has been made in recent years in the treatment of children's diseases and thousands who would have been lost have been saved by taking them in time. Parents should not attempt to treat their children by home remedies and ignorance, but should give their little ones a fair start in life by having the advice and attention of a competent physician. And let us say in conclusion that adenoids have done as much harm to children as any other one ailment of the human body and this trouble might be easily remedied if properly attended to.

J. N., Danville, Va.—The coating of your tongue is due to indigestion and the treatment your physician is giving you is the one for you to follow, as you find it is improving, though perhaps slower than you think it should be. You cannot correct an error of years in a few weeks. We might suggest that you could improve the condition of your stomach by drinking hot water half an hour before meals, or any time when you feel a fullness in your stomach. Drink two or three glassfuls at a time as hot as you can bear it. If you are troubled with acidity, take a pinch of soda occasionally in water, when you feel the acid rising.

E. B. H., Camp Chase, Ohio.—A simple remedy for lice in the head is pulverized parsley seed rubbed well into the roots of the hair. Benzine is also a remedy, well rubbed in, but care should be taken not to have any fire of any kind, not even a lamp, in the room. Crude kerosene will kill lice and nits. Alcohol is better and cleaner than either, but don't use wood alcohol. The use of a fine comb and plenty of soap and water is also recommended.

Mary, Brule, Wis.—Pimples and boils when continued for a long time as yours have been are not amenable to the ordinary simple remedies, and you must consult a physician to learn the cause. When that is known proper treatment may be prescribed, and not before.

J. A., Roby, Texas.—This is a woman patient, who after mentioning a list of her ailments writes: "Don't say go to your physician, for I can't follow their instructions for resting, bathing and dieting. I have two children of my own and three motherless children, all under fifteen, and a husband to do the work for. When I sit down I can't rest, there are so many things that need doing." Yet if she did go to her physician and was told what was wrong with her and properly advised as to treatment, she would be much more able to meet the duties that fall upon her. She has never seen a physician except once and he told her she was suffering from nervousness. This was true enough and from what she tells us her nervousness is due to indigestion and lack of system in doing her work, which makes it over-work. Such patients are not for us to treat except to advise them to consult a physician and learn something about their physical being and its requirements. Utterly ignorant of how to care for their bodies how can they expect health when they do nothing to promote it, and are always doing something to destroy it? COMFORT has thousands of readers like this and they should realize what they are doing to themselves and take measures to prevent disease instead of taking medicine to cure it.

D. S. M., Lawrenceville, Ga.—A man of thirty-two, five feet ten inches tall and weighing two hundred pounds, might have consumption, but it would be mighty hard to make anybody believe it. Still, he should be able to take a deep breath without hurting and he shouldn't have pains in his back, sides and stomach—unless he has indigestion which causes all sorts of peculiar internal pains and nervousness. Just what is wrong we cannot guess, but a physician could tell certainly, if he were consulted and allowed to examine the patient. We recommend that this be done at once.

E. M., Leechburg, Pa.—Possibly the best remedy for tonsil trouble is to remove the tonsils, the operation being a simple one and not causing much pain. The tonsils do not control the voice, though when they are enlarged they render it hoarse. They cause a lot of other trouble, sometimes serious, and you should have them removed, unless after examination your physician tells you you should not, which we hardly think he will do.

E. S., Whittier, Cal.—Asafetida, which is a gum resin from a plant, is useful in promoting the appetite and improving the digestion, in this way relieving nervousness to an extent. It increases the action of the heart and the temperature of the skin, and is a mild brain stimulant increasing the feeling of cheerfulness, the flow of ideas, and sometimes almost has the action of an intoxicant. Its very offensive odor, which cannot be remedied and which affects the breath and the entire skin, prevents its more general use, except in cases of hysteria and depression, when the odor has a certain psychic effect. (2) Aspirin is a form of salicylic acid and is used in some cases of polyarticular rheumatism as deranging the system less than salicylic acid. (3) Sea-sickness and car-sickness are indefinite diseases, so to say, due to nervousness probably, or to causes not definitely known. Some persons are subject to them and others are not and the only sure cure is not to ride on the cars or on the boats. When you awaken at 2 A. M. and cannot go to sleep till five o'clock, you might try reading in bed, after you had got up and walked around, or eaten something to produce a change in your circulation. We do not believe in lying in bed trying to sleep when sleep will not come. Get up and do something, but be ready to get to bed again very quickly if you feel at all sleepy. Sometimes a hot bath will quiet the nerves at that hour.

Comtesse, Brooklyn, N. Y.—It is very likely the adenoids, which should have been removed when you were a child, make you dull and stupid now, and have a defective memory. We advise that you consult a physician at once as to their removal. You live in a community where there are memory teachers in plenty and by proper training your memory may be vastly improved. (2) The slightly crossed eye of your friend is hardly hereditary. Not more so, at least, than any other small physical defect would be and a crossed eye can be remedied by proper glasses, if your friend is not too old to be changed.

F. L. F., Port Hope, Mich.—If the bones of your nose are crooked you cannot make them straight except by an operation. In some cases—many people have their noses straightened—the operation is simple and in others not and what yours will be can only be determined by examination. We advise you not to have it done unless it is quite disfiguring. Short fingers do not necessarily indicate short persons, but usually stocky people have stubby fingers. Just why some people or some hands are smaller than others is farther over in the book of natural production than we have got.

M. T. M., Stephen, Ark.—When a person has been troubled from birth with any kind of disease, it is almost a certainty that no cure is possible and the best that can be done is to afford relief. As you have never had an aurist examine your ears we advise that you do so, the least expensive way being to go to your nearest city where there is an Eye and Ear Hospital. Here you will get the most scientific treatment and the best advice and you will know then what to expect and what to do for the future. Your headaches are the result of the ear trouble. If your condition can be improved by skill, the longer you put off having an examination made the more difficult it will be.

Miss F., Minco, Okla.—By the time you have picked those small red spots on your nose with a pin a little deeper you will have disfiguring blotches there that the most skillful skin specialist cannot restore to their present condition. They are there because the veins in that particular part of your skin are close to the surface and you cannot remove them unless you remove the veins. Let them alone or go to an expensive skin doctor for his treatment, which will probably produce no better results.

Mrs. C. L. G., Delrio, Wash.—Cutaneous diseases, other than those well known for which there are established remedies cannot be treated except by a physician who can examine them and determine causes. In this case you have been making external applications only, when there is a condition indicated which calls for internal remedies. The recurrence of the rash at stated intervals shows that the trouble lies deeper than the skin. Consult a physician and ask for other treatment than external.

A. R. H. S., Hebe Springs, Ark.—For your benefit and that of other COMFORT readers and inquirers who have good remedies which they wish to put up and sell, we will say that the best way to reach customers is to advertise your remedies in your local newspapers and at the same time place them with some druggist you know, reserving the right to sell on your own account at the same price he does. Gradually your remedies will become known in this way and you will build up a good local business. If you happen to have an unusually good remedy which effects many cures your business will grow until you can extend your advertising to papers beyond your county, and trade always follows advertising, if the goods advertised are as represented. Put your remedies up in the best style you can afford, to make them externally attractive. (2) We should not advise you to sell a remedy which you had received from a state institution unless you were authorized to do so. Write to the institution and see if permission will be granted. Also write to Agricultural Department, Washington, D. C. and have your remedy registered under the Pure Drug and Food Act.

Old Subscriber, Lamberton, Minn.—Too many mothers of daughters are deplorably ignorant of their needs at the age your daughter is, fifteen, and you should not depend upon hearsay advice, nor advice by mail, but should consult a physician and learn what every mother of a daughter should know. The most important change in a girl's life occurs at about this age and her future health and happiness depend largely upon her passing through it under the most favorable conditions of exercise, study, diet, sleep, work and play. This is not to be learned by the mother or the girl through a public print, but from the private advice of a competent physician and one who has daughters of his own, if such there be in your vicinity. We think if you will follow our advice in this matter, your daughter's condition will so improve that you need no longer worry about her as you are now doing. All COMFORT mothers with young daughters coming into womanhood are urged to heed this advice.

M. L. A., New Ipswich, N. H.—Neuritis is an inflammation of the sheath of the nerve and in its milder forms is sometimes referred to as rheumatic inflammation. Ordinarily it is a most painful disease and its cure is slow and careful treatment is necessary. Its cause is often obscure, but it may be brought on by cold or shock. (2) The "Leggra" you mention is mispronunciation of pellagra, described elsewhere in this column.

J. O. M., Promise City, Iowa.—Pellagra, also known as Italian leprosy, Alpine scurvy and by other names, is a disease affecting the skin most exposed to sunlight. It is common in hot countries and its predisposing causes are heredity, poverty, insufficient and improper food and clothing, malaria and especially the eating of diseased corn, the fungus containing the poison or parasite. It is fatal after a few years if left to take its course, but it may last for fifty or sixty years. Ask your doctor for other particulars. In recent years especial efforts have been made in this country and others to control it.

away, bored or disappointed, disgusted frequently, insulted some times. The theater someday may fulfill its high mission, but at present it fails oftener than it succeeds. At any rate it fails often enough to make the farmer's wife, if she knows, rejoice that her boys and girls are removed from its influence.

In a summing up of those things which do not come into the life of the farmer's wife we have a list of non-essentials. Moreover, the question arises as to how many of these things enter actively into lives of city people. Strange as it may seem, outside of a narrow circle of artists and art lovers, it is a fact that the people who go to the art galleries are mainly strangers. During a week's visit to the city, the farmer's wife can crowd in as many, sometimes more museums, matinees, concerts, art galleries and other unusual experiences than the city woman thinks she has time for in a year.

The main struggle and expense of life in the big city is getting the things that in the country are as free as air. People of small means look forward all year and save all year for the summer outing, which, by general agreement is most delightfully and heathfully spent in the country—that same place once despised as the extinguisher of ambition,—the destroyer of hopes.

So when we balance the advantages of the farmer's wife against her limitations, the blindest, most bigoted pro-urbanite can see that in all the essentials for happiness the former overwhelmingly outweighs the latter.

NEW EDITION
Uncle Charlie's Story Book
51st Birthday Souvenir

A Beautiful New Edition of Uncle Charlie's Story Book is now offered as a souvenir of his fifty-first birthday which occurred September 25th. This splendid book of 157 pages printed in good, clear type on fine paper, was gotten up by Uncle Charlie regardless of trouble and expense as a worthy memorial of his fiftieth birthday a year ago.

Besides six unique stories, a dramatic sketch and personal memoirs and thrilling incidents of his remarkable life, all from his inspired pen, there are chapters by "Billy the Goat" and Maria which throw interesting side lights on his character and let you into the mysteries of his daily life. Illustrated with new pictures of him and Maria and Billy.

The immense popularity of this book has exhausted the previous editions and this handsome new edition has been printed to meet the continued large demand for it.

This edition is limited, so this may be your last chance to obtain a copy. Every home should have one.

FREE Premium Offer

It is bound in two styles, both handsome and either good enough. One in heavy, fancy opal blue paper covers known as "cloth of gold paper," will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of two new subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, or for your own 2-year renewal at 30 cents and one 25-cent subscription, 55 cents in all.

The other, beautifully bound in lilac silk with stiff covers, will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of four subscriptions at 25 cents each, one dollar in all, or for your own 2-year renewal at 30 cents and three 25-cent subscriptions, $1.05 in all.

In either offer 2-year renewals at 30 cents each will count the same as 15-month subscriptions at 25 cents each.

This offer holds good while the supply of books holds out.

Probably this is the last edition that will ever be printed.

BE QUICK and secure a copy while they last.

These are the best and most costly premiums that we give for such size clubs.

are so exhausted when the day's toil is done that they are glad either to go to bed or else go to the saloon or the movies for a little rest or relaxation. The church says: "The poor ye have always with you," and so the masses think that even heaven itself has entered into a conspiracy to keep them poor and wretched. The pulpit is silent except to things which concern another world. It is so much safer to talk of other worlds than this one. You can't offend anyone. You must remember, my dear Lulu, that every man who has ever tried to help humanity up the brier-strewn path of progress from Christ to our present day, has been turned on and rent by those he has tried to help. I'll wager a thousand dollars to a cent that if I were to go out into any typical rural community and give the people a good hot talk and try and drive a few ideas into their thick cocoas, I'd be egged and stoned and have to flee for my life. New ideas do get into people's heads and the world does progress, but that is due more to the mighty wheels of evolution, the urge of God, the scourge of necessity, than the thinking ability of mankind as a whole. There are however, thousands of thinking men who would give their lives, even as I would, to help the world onward and upward, but their voices are as of those crying in the wilderness, and though they can do much good work in their narrow spheres, necessity restricts the field of their operations and they do not have, as I am privileged to have, a pulpit from which I can talk monthly to six millions of people. But don't despair, we are moving forward. Things that were regarded as anarchistic twenty years ago are now too commonplace to be mentioned. My ideas seem progressive to you, but as a matter of fact, there is nothing I have talked about or advocated in these columns that is not considered, ancient, fossilized and ossified in really progressive countries. Now, Lulu, look around you. There are plenty of progressive men right in Jamestown, North Dakota. I met one there as far back as twenty-six years ago. There are good men and men of ideals in every community, but as a rule they foolishly keep quiet, for goodness is a modest flower, and so the blatent mouthey, grasping politician, shrieks from the house tops and the ignorant believe he is the only one to lead them to victory, but there are good people in the world and right will conquer in the end, for the truth that is to set us free is gradually creeping into men's minds and God has ordained that truth shall conquer, so gird on your armor every one of you and take your place in the ranks of right and give no quarter.

P. S. You will find my autograph in my books which you can easily obtain.

144 Co. C. A. Corps, FORT MOULTRIE, S. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a soldier boy of twenty-one. Have been in the service one year and am liking the army fine. All I dislike about the army is I have to be away from my dear old dad and mother. I never was away from home so long in all my life. It's funny how boys will wander so far from home isn't it. But when my entialment here is done I am going back to my father's house and there I am going to stay until God takes one of us I remain with a verse, when my entialment here is done if I see this in print I will call again,

Your neffew,
LEXINGTON B. BROWN. (League number 39,701).

When I have labored at my task,
From breaking of the dawn
Toiling hard with brain and muscal,
Till I'm tired out and worne
Won't it make feel quite rested,
At the setting of the sun,
To have someone to go home to,
When my enlistment here is done.

All the boys and girls will meet me,
With a joy—hall full of fun
And my girl will hang around my neck
When my enlistment here is done.

Perhaps my sweetheart has not been true
And now is another's wife,
And with my discharge I'll decide
To start afresh in life.
Yet at times I must be thinking
As the years apass me run
Of the cherished friends who'll meet me
When my enlistment here is done.

Well, General Lexington B. Brown (and if you are not a general by the time this gets into print, you are a poor soldier) we have all been greatly entertained by your letter. One thing is certain, Lexington, though the army may have taught you discipline (and there is nothing finer to learn than that) and how to fire a fourteen-inch gun, it has certainly forgotten to teach you how to spell, and an army that neglects to do that, especially an army that is supposed to belong to a democratic nation, is sadly neglecting its duty. The more education a soldier has, the better for the soldier and the better for the country, for education produces thinkers and thinkers can find other ways to settle their differences than by spilling blood. I've no doubt, Cousin Lexington B. Brown, that if you got in the way of one of those bullets when Vera Cruz was taken, you would have had a hero's funeral, and the funeral that was given those poor boys here in New York was something that might have been envied by a Roman Emperor. But once more I've got my opinion of a nation that will give its soldiers splendid obsequies but declines to give them a first-class education, and there isn't a boy born here in these United States that couldn't have a first-class education if the nation cared to give it to him. But very few of those who go to school ever get their noses inside a high school, and the boys that graduate from high school are getting so rare that the last remaining specimen in captivity will soon be found in a glass case in the Smithsonian Institute. When a wealthy country expects its sons to bear arms and die for it, it, at least ought to see that all the people within its borders are educated and provided with profitable employment. What's the good of fighting for a country that won't do that for you? It's all very well for Congressmen to pass laws compelling other fellows to fight. They know very well none of their precious hides will be punctured. We have a law compelling all men under a certain age to bear arms, but we haven't any law that will prevent long and agonizing periods of unemployment, and we might just as well have them as not. We haven't any law that will keep young people in school until they are thoroughly educated. The law that is applied to poor and uneducated people is always one sided. It exacts much and gives little. Once more I declare as I have previously done in these columns that I have never seen a country yet that is worth fighting for. I am living in a country that allows poor old women between seventy and eighty years of age, hundreds and hundreds of them to spend their last wretched hours on earth on their bended knees scrubbing out office buildings. Come to New York and see them. It is the most pitiful sight in the world. Scores of these women have raised families, many of whom have given their lives to their country. I always think of these poor old souls on the Fourth of July when we are getting excited about our freedom. Oh, yes, I know there are army schools, but that doesn't alter the fact that I've just read four letters from soldier boys that were scandalously illiterate. To my mind there is nothing too good for our soldiers. Now Lexington, to discuss your letter. You say: "I remain with a verse." Which verse is it in your pottery you are going to remain with? I suppose that's a verse you are fond of and you are averse to leaving it. You say "when my entialment is done." What's "entialment" Lexington? I suppose that's a new kind of bug that Uncle Sam is shooting into you to prevent you taking typhoid. Whatever it is Lexington, I hope it won't interfere with you making a bee line for home as soon as your soldiering is over. Let me tell you that you are a mighty lucky boy to have a home to crawl into, for that's more than most fellows have. Usually when a soldier leaves the army his only place of refuge is the back parlor of a saloon, and all that the country has to offer him for his devotion and heroism is an overstocked labor market, and when his money is gone a bench in a city park or a brake beam berth on a hobo special, otherwise a freight train. In your first verse you tell us you have been toiling hard with brain and "muscal". Lex, old boy, do tell us something about that "muscal." I'll bet that's some new dope the beef trust is injecting into the army ration. The Goat says Lex, you mean muscle. Which did you find most exhausting, toiling with brain or muscle? Personally I think you have used a little more muscle than brain, or you would not have had me standing on my head trying to read your letter, and I can't stand on my head as easily as I did in those prehistoric days when I hung by my tail in the forest primeval. It's lovely to think of you reaching the old homestead with all the village down at the depot to greet you and see you bring home your month's pay—that little fifteen per. I don't wonder that you say they will meet you with a "joy—hall full of fun." I notice you have a dash after joy. Well if we ever get any joy in this world, most of us have to dash after it. I know any I ever got had to be secured that way. What about that hall full of fun? Oh, I see you're going to hire a hall. That's right Lex, hire a hall, hire a hall, and when your fifteen is spent that girl who is hanging around your neck will drop you like a hot potato. It's only in song and story you come back and find your swetheart hasn't married another fellow. The girl who can get a chance to grab a good provider, is going to do it right on the jump. That is not her fault, that's the economic urge. She is not going to wait around four years while you are serving your enlistment and then go down to the depot and find you coming home from the Philippines with a chocolate-colored bride. It must be delightful to think of those days when you will join the old folks once more, and just as you say:

"Yet at times I must be thinking
As the years apass me run
Of the cherished friends who'll meet me."

Wouldn't it just be glorious if we could get a slant at you with all the years running past you. Old Father Time clearing the way with his scythe, while the almanacs and calendars and the hours, months, years and minutes dissipated the cruel period of waiting that holds you from crawling into the family hay mow and getting your feet under Pop's table, filling your face full of Mom's biscuits and Sue's chocolate cake. Lex, I envy you. I'll never be able to look forward to a treat like that.

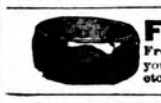
MAYBERRY, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I will try to write you and send you four subscribers for which I want your book of poems. I am a little girl age thirteen years. I live way up here on top of the Blue Ridge mountain. My papa is R. F. D. carrier from Mayberry. He has a long, rough route to carry over and in winter the roads get so bad he has to go horseback most of the time. Now how will he manage to carry several twenty pound packages when the snow is drifting and blowing, and he is bound to go horseback. Uncle Charlie, I like your letters fine. Mamma says she knows you are a good man because you are in favor of equal suffrage. Papa says it's because you are writing for a woman's paper is the only reason you are in for women voting. But I believe you write what you think. I would send you some chestnuts if you would eat them. We all like COMFORT. Mamma has been taking it for eight years. I hope you enjoyed your birthday. I hope you can get better so you won't have to be a shut-in always.

I will close, I hope you will excuse all mistakes, I hope to write a better letter some day.

DELLA YEATTS.,



Della, in your letter you say: "Mamma says she knows you are a good man because you are in favor of equal suffrage. Papa says it is because you are writing for a woman's paper, and for that reason alone that you are in favor of women voting. I believe you write what you think." Tell your papa, Della, that it is very cruel and unkind of him to impute motives to me which are entirely false and unjust. It wouldn't matter to me whether I was writing in a woman's paper, a man's paper, or a monkey's paper I should still advocate votes for women. Your papa must have a very poor opinion of men in general and myself in particular if he thinks that there are none of us ready and willing to fight for a just and holy cause without getting paid for it. I can see, if your father and millions of others cannot see, that not only women but all humanity will be helped when women vote. If your papa, Della, will come to my bedside I will make him as anxious to vote for woman suffrage as I am myself, and if he can present a single reason why women shouldn't vote, I will present him with the prettiest twenty dollar bill he ever saw. That's the trouble with all reform movements. If you try to do anything for the people, instead of endeavoring to study and learn about the reform you are trying to push through, no matter how much good it's going to do, you will meet with violent opposition, because people hate anything that's new. The masses have been badly treated and always expect to be badly treated, and they can't imagine that anyone on earth would do anything for them, except rob them. The world always crucifies its reformers, and after they are dead and buried the people rush to worship them. Then too, the masses hate you if you try to make them think, for the most painful thing in all the world for most people to do is to think. Thinking means effort, and though people are ever ready to exert their muscles, most of them want to kill you if you ask them to exercise their minds. The masses have let others do their thinking, and you bet the readymade thoughts that the masses have absorbed have been prepared with just one idea and that is to keep people more ignorant than ever. As long as you can control the think boxes of the people, you can control their pocketbooks. If the world had the habit of deep and broad thinking it wouldn't take us ten minutes to do what now takes thirty to fifty years. Now if Della's Papa had studied the women suffrage movement he would have seen the justice and the necessity of it all, both from a man's and woman's point of view, and when he read COMFORT and saw that I was agitating and working for this great reform, instead of doubting my sincerity he would have applauded me and would have scorned

Powerful 3½ Ft. Telescope

This is not a worthless toy but a real telescope made by one of the largest manufacturers in Europe. When closed as shown in the illustration it is 12 inches long with a circumference of 5 3-4 inches, when all five sections are pulled out its full length is over 3 1-2 feet. It is well made of the best material, brass bound throughout; the lens are carefully ground and adjusted by experts and are so powerful that objects miles away are brought right up to your eyes with astonishing clearness. In fact with this telescope it is really possible to pick out and identify houses, barns, horses, cattle, streams, ponds, bits of scenery, etc., at a range of from 5 to 10 miles. Such a telescope as this is an absolute necessity to farmers and ranchmen, as a matter of fact it is something needed in every home whether in city, town or country. The young people always enjoy the use of a good telescope and they are just fine to take along on hunting, fishing, touring or vacation trips. As a rule a telescope of this size sells for a very high price but COMFORT has contracted for an enormous quantity of them thus bringing the cost down low enough so that we can give them away as a premium. If you really want a good telescope do not hesitate to order this one because it is fully guaranteed by the manufacturers and that guarantee is backed up by us. With this telescope we also send you a Solar Eye Piece which you can use to study the sun and solar eclipses and you get the whole outfit free and prepaid on the terms of the following Club Offer. For a club of only six 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 each, we will send you this big forty-two inch long Telescope with Solar Eye Piece by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 602.

a half gallon of hard cider add two eight ounce packages of Rochelle Salts; put in fruit jar and keep lid tight. Shake well before taking. Dose, four tablespoonfuls each day as long as it lasts and if not well, repeat. I can't say that this will cure all kinds of rheumatism, but I have seen cases that it has cured so don't be afraid to try it.

Now sisters, will you all please write me? If you will I will promise to try and answer. I would like very much to hear from some of you that live where nuts grow, and you that live close to the ocean, please write and tell me of its wonders. I want to hear from you all, no matter where you live. Ask all the questions you like and I will try and answer them. Those that are in a hurry for an answer, please enclose stamp, as my time and postage are both limited.

With love to our dear editor and all,

MRS. FLOY KINCAID.

538 North 3rd St., MISSOULA, MONT.

DEAR SISTERS:

I feel as though I must write to this dear old paper, as I love it so well, and read every word in it, and can hardly wait until the time comes for another paper. My letter will not be of much interest I fear, as I read the other sisters' letters and they're all so full of interesting things.

I will begin by telling how I look if anyone should wish to know, I'm very small, five feet three inches tall, weigh ninety-two pounds, am thirty-three years old, have dark hair and blue eyes and dark complexion. I've been married sixteen years. I have three girls, aged fourteen, twelve and ten. We came out West almost two years ago and have lived in Missoula since then. This is a beautiful little town of about eighteen thousand people. We have fine schools and to take it all around this is a fine town to live in. There is most always plenty of work to be had, for anyone who cares to work, at good wages, and it is such a healthy place. The town is almost entirely surrounded by beautiful mountains, some of which are covered with snow all the year. We have good water, pure and cold all the time as it is melted snow from off the mountains. There's lots of good fishing in most all the streams and good hunting in the mountains, during fall and winter. The summers here are simply delightful, so pleasant, and there's always a cool breeze, and at night it's cool enough to sleep with plenty of covers. The winters are grand also, not as cold as people in the East imagine, but there's hardly a day without sunshine, while of course we have plenty of snow, during January and February, but the cold doesn t seem to affect a person half as much as in the East. The mountains serve as a great protection from the blizzards, therefore we have as fine a climate as anyone would wish to find. We came here from Missouri out not one of us ever wants to go back again to make our home. The people here are nice and don't seem like strangers. We have certainly made a host of friends since coming here, and let me say right here, that is what we live for; what is nicer than good neighbors and true friends? This would indeed be a sorrowful old world to live in without them. What a blessed work Uncle Charlie is doing. I enjoy his letters and little talks. Aso Mrs. Wilkinson; she surely must be a true Christian. If I could have the pleasure of knowing her in person I should surely be proud and happy. I get a little homesick and blue sometimes, but when I pick up COMFORT I think what a blessing it is for us to have good health, and our happy little family, and how thankful we should be. How sorry I feel for the poor afflicted ones, and I try to help all those that come for help, when I think they indeed need help.

I will now add a few little helps:

Scraped raw potato is the best thing for a burn.

I use flour sacks for lots of different things around the house. Four sewed together make a nice table spread.

Best wishes for everyone, MRS. LAURA HAWKINS.

BILTMORE, R. R. 2, N. C.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have often wondered if there were any COMFORT sisters in this part of the state or if they are all just like me, enjoying the good things our dear old paper is giving us without giving anything in return?

I live near the famous Biltmore Estate and just two miles from Ashville. It is called the "Land of the sky," here in western North Carolina. Many pleasure and health seekers come here at all times of the year. The summers are very cool and pleasant and the winters are not very cold.

I am five feet five inches tall, have blue eyes and light hair and weigh one hundred and nine pounds, am twenty-six years old. I have been married three years. We have one little boy, James Leslie, a jolly, mischievious little fellow of two years. He is a lot of company for me for I am alone most of the time. I wonder if any of our sisters' husbands are Walkins salesmen. Mine is and is away from home most of the time.

Many write about their mothers and their love for them, but they forget father. I have one of the best of mothers who would do anything for her children, yet I have a father who would do the same. The mother has a lot of worry with the children and her work, but don't think the fathers are having an easy time for they share hardships and trials together, so let us not forget him with a word of praise.

Wishing our dear old paper and all the sisters success I am, an old member, MRS. L. E. ROGERS.

COREY, COLO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have never seen a letter from Kit Carson County, Colorado, so I will try to write a little. Husband and I came out here to make us a home in 1910. We proved up under the three-year law, but are still living on our claim. Last year our crop was rather poor, but we have a fine show for a good crop this year.

We can raise most every kind of garden truck here and I think it is a fine place to live.

I do pity the people in the cities that have to be shut in and can't get the free air of the country. We have good water. The nights are so cool here that one must sleep with a quilt over them in June, July and August.

I have two boys, five and three years of age. I will tell you how I did with my baby for his bowels. My father is a doctor and he did not like to start a tiny baby with taking physic. I washed out his bowels every morning with one half cup of clear warm water until he was three months old. I also ate corn-meal in every style and it helped my baby's bowels and made the milk richer and more of it. I hope this will help some mother and baby out of the same trouble. My baby is three years old now and I never have any trouble with his bowels.

Now for a little advice. Can anyone tell me how to get rid of cut worms in the garden, also millers in the house?

I always put one tablespoon of vinegar into a skillet of lard when I fry fried-cakes and the lard doesn't soak into the cakes.

Good luck to all.

MRS. ETHYL DUNCANSON CRIST.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

By rubbing a fresh lemon thoroughly into a soured sponge and rinsing it several times in lukewarm water it will become as good as new.

To preserve leather and render it waterproof, one pound beef tallow, twelve ounces pulverized alum. Melt together and apply with a brush while hot and allow to soak in thoroughly. Apply to soles of boots as well as uppers. If desired to polish the boots, apply after a day or two the following: One ounce white wax, one teaspoon turpentine, one teaspoon lampblack. Mix and apply cold. Mrs. Bulah Ziegler, Junction City, Kans.

To color ostrich plumes, put some gasoline in a bowl and tint with artist's tube paints.

To clean wall paper, dampen some bran with gasoline, put it in a thin cloth and rub the soiled spot. It will not injure the most delicate paper. Mrs. A. Bradshaw, Jerseyville, Ont.

Never put meat directly on ice as it extracts the good meat juices.

A small quantity of salt put into whitewash will make it stick better.

A teaspoon of pulverized alum mixed with stove polish will give a brilliant and lasting luster.

To remove blood stains, dip the stained fabric in kerosene and then wash.

Gloss can be removed from black silk by sponging it with a solution of one teaspoon of ammonia to a cup of coffee.

Remedies

DROPSY AND KIDNEY TROUBLE.—Make a strong decoction of mullin leaves and roots, strain and add a small quantity of liquor to keep it from turning sour. Dose, one tablespoon three times a day.

MRS. A. BRADSHAW, Jerseyville, Ont.

POISON OAK. (Requested.)—Take good apple vinegar, add a little soda and salt and apply as hot as can be endured. This is painful for a few minutes, but a sure cure.

MRS. EFFIE MULL, 17 E. Illinois St., Evansville, Ind.

STONE BRUISE.—Pound an onion to a pulp and bind on bruise. Very few applications are needed before the bruise is ready to be lanced.

MRS. CORA BURLINGAME, Horseheads, N. Y.

CAKED BREAST.—For sisters who are troubled with caked breast, make a poultice of flaxseed meal and bind on. Will give relief in a little while, when dry wet again and bind on. I have used this with three babies.

COUGHS.—When coughing badly wring out a cloth dipped in ice water and apply to bare throat, put a dry cloth on top to keep clothes from getting wet. (A sure remedy.) My mother used it when I was a child.

MRS. T. A. DUGGAN, Okfuskee, Okla.

A GOOD COUGH REMEDY.—Take chestnut leaves, white pine bark and leaves, and Spanish-needles (sometimes called Bubel lice) of equal parts and make a strong tea, and drink in the place of water. This is the only thing that saved our baby when she had the whooping cough this spring.

MRS. GERTRUDE EBNER, Orangeville, Pa.

TO CURE CORNS.—Rub them every night with turpentine.

Weak, brittle nails may be strengthened by dipping them in a weak solution of alum water and afterwards rubbing them with lemon juice.

Figs soaked in water over night and eaten in the morning before other food will often prove a relief for constipation, especially in young children.

This Wife and Mother Wishes to Tell You FREE How She Stopped Her Husband's Drinking

By all Means Write to Her And Learn How She did it.

For over 20 years James Anderson of 602 Elm Ave., Hillburn, N. Y., was a very hard drinker. His case seemed a hopeless one, but 10 years ago his wife in their own little home, gave him a simple remedy which much to her delight stopped his drinking entirely.

To make sure that the remedy was responsible for this happy result she also tried it on her brother and several of her neighbors. It was successful in every case. None of them has touched a drop of intoxicating liquor since.

She now wishes everyone who has drunkenness in their homes to try this simple remedy for she feels sure that it will do as much for others as it has for her. It can be given secretly if desired, and without cost she will gladly and willingly tell you what it is. All you have to do is write her a letter asking her how she cured her husband of drinking and she will reply by return mail in a sealed envelope. As she has nothing to sell do not send her money. Simply send a letter with all confidence to Mrs Margaret Anderson at the address given above, taking care to write your name and full address plainly. (We earnestly advise every one of our readers who wishes to cure a dear one of drunkenness to write to this lady today. Her offer is a sincere one.)

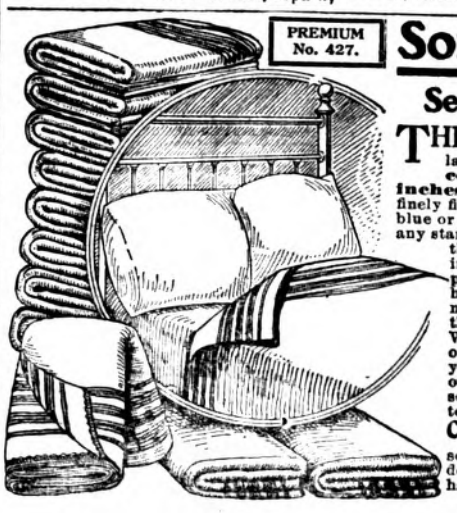
MUSIC, MONEY & PUZZLE



A four inch cylinder Harmonica, a Coin Holder and a Puzzle all in one. The soft, sweet tones of this round harmonica are superior in many ways to an ordinary harmonica owing to the reinforcement of the instrument by being wholly encased in the metal cylinder. In addition to being a first-class Mouth Organ, it has combined with it a cute Six-Spot Puzzle and a Coin Holder for nickels, five cent pieces, for car fare and small change. Five pieces of money can be carried in this end of the instrument. The puzzle is fascinating and good practice for the eye, nerves and mind. This combination harmonica is new, has not been offered for sale in stores, cannot be found everywhere and is sure to be a big favorite.

SPECIAL OFFER. Send only one 15-months subscription to COMFORT at 25c for a Harmonica as above described. Only new subscriptions accepted. Premium No. 362.

Soft Warm Bed Blankets

Sent Prepaid For A Club Of Six

THIS IS an offer which no good housewife can afford to overlook. It is your opportunity to secure as many large comfortable bed blankets as you may need without a cent of expense. These fine double blankets are 72 inches long and 55 inches wide, extremely well made and finely finished. They are pure white in color and come with either blue or pink borders. Please notice that they are large enough for any standard size bed being of sufficient length to come up well on the pillow and wide enough so that they may be snugly tucked in at the sides. This is in reality one of the best bargains in a premium we have ever offered on account of the fact that we have bought a large quantity of these blankets direct from the mill at a special low price and therefore are enabled to offer them to our readers for a very small club of subscriptions. When you think of this big warm blanket on your bed or lying on a closet shelf ready for use when wanted, we believe that you will want to start a club at once for the sake of securing one or more of them free of all cost to you. We will gladly send you one or more of these splendid blankets upon the terms of the following

Club Offer. For a club of only six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you one of these large, double bed blankets free by Parcel Post prepaid. You may have your choice of either blue or pink border.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Five Wheel Chairs in October

252 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Well done, my good friends. Five wheel chairs in October certainly is an encouraging gain over the previous month in which the club earned only two. Now let us all boost together for the Wheel-Chair Club this month and see if we can raise the number again so to make Thanksgiving a season of rejoicing for as many as possible of the poor, shut-in applicants who are suffering and anxiously waiting for a wheel chair.

The five October chairs go to the following named persons, who, as you will see, were very much in need of them. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions that the friends of the respective recipients have sent in aid of the Wheel-Chair Club.

George Spencer, 9 High Street, Bradford, Mass., 200; Mrs. Callie Hall, Iuka, Miss., 117; Edgar Gorman, R. R. 6, Winnsboro, Texas, 107; Thomas L. Griffin, Jena, La., 93; Mrs. Henry Crowley, Temple, Okla., 85.

George Spencer sent us 200 subscriptions, all in one bunch, for his chair, and they reached us on the first day of October. That was quick work for him and his friends; but it is not at all exceptional for quite a number of other wheel-chair applicants have done the same thing.

Mrs. Callie Hall is a shut-in old lady very much in need of a wheel chair and without the means to obtain one, as I am informed by Mrs. Annie L. Vinson who sent in the most of the 117 subscriptions that have been received in Mrs. Hall's behalf. This is the third COMFORT wheel chair that Mrs. Vinson has been chiefly instrumental in procuring for deserving shut-ins. Mrs. Vinson is a shut-in, and through her own efforts and those of her friends she obtained a COMFORT wheel chair for herself in February, 1913. Then she went to work again and in three months sent in subscriptions enough to get a wheel chair for James Thorn in May, 1913. Mrs. Vinson, though an invalid and a sufferer, has done splendid work in thus assisting to provide wheel chairs for two shut-ins besides herself, and I hope she may have the strength, as I know she has the will, to continue to help others that are in distress, but I refrain from printing her address in order to save her the annoyance of being deluged by letters soliciting her aid. Should not her shining example spur to action those who heretofore have done nothing for the Wheel-Chair Club?

Edgar Gorman, eleven years old, has a spinal trouble which has paralyzed his lower limbs. The wheel chair will be a great comfort to him and relief to his mother who has to take care of him.

Thomas L. Griffin, age 15, is another helpless cripple suffering and struggling with spinal disease. His mother sent in all the subscriptions credited to him.

Mrs. Henry Crowley has tubercular disease of the hip joint and bone, which entirely deprives her of the use of her right leg.

Through a typographical error in a previous Roll of Honor Mrs. R. J. Farris of Chicago, Ill., was credited with having sent in 16 subscriptions for Emma Walker; the number should have been 20, and I am pleased to make this correction.

I have written so much that I will omit the letters of thanks this time, and will close by calling your attention to this month's Roll of Honor, printed below, and with my sincere thanks and best wishes to you all for a happy Thanksgiving,

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

George Spencer, Mass., for own wheel chair, 200; Mrs. Robert Shaw, Mich., for Robert Shaw, 82; Martha Krop, N. Mex for N. M. Hogg, 60; Mrs. Henry Crowley, Okla., for own wheel chair, 45; J. F. Woolwine, Va., for Mrs. J. F. Woolwine, 43; Lena Lasewell, Ill., for Harvey Martin, 36; Katye Sanders, Miss., own wheel chair, 33; Mrs. H. J. Bail, Miss., for own wheel chair, 33; Mrs. Mattye Russell, Okla., for Odessa Rasure 26; Mrs. Carrie Griggs, N. Y., 25; Mrs. Cora Branch, Va., for Mrs. J. F. Woolwine, 20; Meta Chambers, Okla., for Mrs. Henry Crowley, 20; Carrie Dampl, Ark., for Bama Leslie, 20; Mrs. E. J. Kloeckler, Okla., for Mrs. Henry Crowley, 20; Sara Martin, N. Mex., for N. M. Comfort's League of Cousins

all those reactionaries who cry down everything that makes for progress, just because it's new. If mother had voted and grandmother had voted, and the anti-suffragrists had been born into a voting world, the idea would never enter their heads that there was anything wrong in a woman daring to record her opinions at the ballot box. It is a strange thing that the world should want to stand in its own light and halt its own progress, but that is just what the world is always trying to do and if it were not for a few determined, bright-minded, imaginative people who work day and night without thanks or pay to push the world along, we should soon drift back to the stone hatchet period. COMFORT is not a woman's paper to any greater extent than it is a man's paper. COMFORT is a household publication. Doubtless there are more women who read it than men, that's because women are quicker to size up a good thing than a man, and also because women are doing more reading than men, and therefore more thinking. As soon however, as COMFORT gets in the house, the whole family begin to grab for it for there is something in it for each and all. I always try to make my department appeal to the men, as they are the ones in the majority of cases who do the voting, and also the ones who are most in need of material that will give them new ideas on political and economic questions, things of which most people are sublimely ignorant. If I can jar some of the cobwebs out of the male brains the rest is easy. It is easy to get the women thinking, but it's an awful task to jar loose the male mind but it's worth the effort, and I venture to say there are more men reading COMFORT than can be found reading any other household journal in existence. You are quite right Della, in assuming that I write what I think, and there isn't a publication in this country, COMFORT or otherwise, rich enough to hire me to write what I don't think. I have handled the men pretty roughly in these columns, and they have blessed instead of cussed me for it. No worthy man objects to hearing the truth even if it hurts, and now Della, just tell papa, that I am in dead earnest in my work and with a world full of Doubting Thomases, Weary Willies, Sleepy Johns, Tired Tims, Grafting Georges believe me, it needs someone with a punch to wake them up. Even if the men gave us a perfect world, the votes of women would be as necessary for the good of the country as they are now, for when women begin to study public questions, they will have more to think about that is worth while, and the more they think the more their brains will develop, and the more intellect they will have to pass on to each succeeding generation. Now Della, tell Papa this is what I stand for, and I hope he and all of you will be with me in the battle. I am fighting for:

"The cause that needs assistance,
The wrong that needs resistance,
The heaven in the distance,
And the good that I can do."

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for 15 months if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended two full years beyond date of expiration, if you remit 35 cents.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's 15-months subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for 15 months. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for November

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Written references from postmaster or physician must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

The best way to show you are thankful is to give others cause to be thankful. These poor souls are not looking for turkey, but you might send them the price of a few oranges, a box of crackers or even a loaf of bread. They don't want any tracts. They can get to heaven without the tract fiends' assistance. A Happy Thanksgiving, and God bless you all. Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Where the Money Goes

"Speaking of where all the money goes that we can manage to get hold of and let go of in the course of a year," said a party who looked as if he had had experience both ways, "let me give you a few figures for the United States. For instance, we spend for churches and church work, 175 millions a year; for education, 325 millions; for boots and shoes, 450 millions; for flour, 455 millions; for potatoes, 210 millions; for meat, 1,550 millions; and for liquors that intoxicate, 1,675 millions. That's only a small part of giving it up after we get it. Now about not getting it. For instance, in some states the loss in wheat and corn annually from insects amounts to 20 millions; in Texas the boll weevil destroys 20 millions a year in cotton and the tick that causes cattle fever makes a loss of a hundred millions, in New York the insects destroy 26 millions' worth of growing stuff and the total loss by insects in the whole country reaches the enormous amount of 700 millions, nearly two millions a day. That sounds like eating money, doesn't it?"

Sister: Read My Free Offer!

I am a woman.
I know a woman's trials.
I know her need of sympathy and help.

If you, my sister, are unhappy because of ill-health, if you feel unfit for household duties, social pleasures, or daily employment, write and tell me just how you suffer, and ask for my free ten days' trial of a home treatment suited to your needs. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any man. I want to tell you how to cure yourself at home at a cost of about 12 cents a week.

If you suffer from women's peculiar ailments causing pain in the head, back, or bowels, feeling of weight and dragging down sensation, falling or displacement of pelvic organs, causing kidney and bladder weakness or constipation and piles, painful or irregular periods, catarrhal conditions and discharges, extreme nervousness, depressed spirits, melancholy, desire to cry, fear of something evil about to happen, creeping feeling along the spine, palpitation, hot flashes, weariness, sallow complexion with dark circles under the eyes, pain in the left breast or general feeling that life is not worth living.

I INVITE YOU TO SEND TODAY FOR MY FREE TEN DAYS' TREATMENT

and learn how these ailments can be easily and surely conquered at home without the dangers and expense of an operation. When you are cured, and able to enjoy life again, you can pass the good word along to some other sufferer. My home treatment is for young or old. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain how to overcome green sickness (chlorosis), irregularities, headaches, and lassitude in young women and restore them to plumpness and health. Tell me if you are worried about your daughter. Remember it costs you nothing to give my home treatment a ten days' trial, and does not interfere with daily work. If health is worth asking for, then accept my generous offer and write for the free treatment, including my illustrated booklet, "Women's Own Medical Adviser." I will send all in plain wrappers postpaid. To save time, you can cut out this offer, mark your feelings, and return to me. Send today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

Help! Help!! Help!!!

YES, we want every reader of COMFORT to help us save about $3,000 a year in unnecessary correspondence and postage and here's the way you can do it. When you send your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for any premium which we give away for one subscription, be sure to send us, in addition to the regular subscription price of 25 cents, either 5 cents or 10 cents extra, whichever amount the offer calls for. If you send us a subscription that is not your own, then you are to remit 25 cents only, but if you send your own subscription you are to send us a total of either 30 cents or 35 cents as stated in the offer. We positively cannot fill your orders unless this rule is complied with, so we ask all of our subscribers to please bear this fact in mind and thus make sure of getting your premiums quicker, at the same time saving both you and ourselves a whole lot of inconvenience and useless letter writing. Help us to save the money that we are now spending in this manner and we can give you a better COMFORT and more and better premiums than ever before.

A Nice Warm Sweater

For MEN, BOYS and small Children

Is The Best Preventive of Colds and Pneumonia!

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," so goes the old saying and this handsome, warm, close-fitting sweater will save doctor's bills for any man, boy or child by warding off those miserable winter colds which so often lead to deadly pneumonia and consumption. It is the best of all fall and winter garments for little children to play in out-of-doors and for boys and girls going to school on cold fall and winter days, or when sliding or skating or engaging in other outdoor winter sports. For men or boys either who are compelled to travel or to work midst sleet, snow and ice, a good warm sweater is nothing short of an absolute necessity. The sweater offered here is just as warm and comfortable as it looks, a perfect-fitting garment closely woven of the best material and beautifully finished and it buttons down the front like a coat so it is very easy to get in or out of. This sweater may be washed as often as desired in the ordinary way and it positively will not shrink or change color. You can have your choice of colors of either brown, blue, cardinal or grey and the sizes run from 24 to 30 for children, 32 to 36 for young boys and girls and 38 to 44 for men and young men. Be sure to send chest measurement when ordering and we will guarantee to send you the exact size desired. Also do not forget to mention color wanted.

Club Offer No. 1. For a club of six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you a man's or boy's size sweater free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 649.

Club Offer No. 2. For a club of four 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you a child's sweater free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 704.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a 15-month subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for fifteen months.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. J. P., New Hampshire.—We do not think the laws of your state or of the state of Vermont require a license to conduct a small mercantile business, but the local ordinances of some of the larger places may require a license; we think the sale of alcohol, drugs, chemicals, explosives and articles of such a nature would require a license in any state; we think you should procure your goods from some reputable wholesale house, but we fear you may not succeed in such a business without more knowledge of its nature than your letter indicates.

X. Y. Z., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that women attain their majority at the end of twenty-one years, after which time they are free from parental control, and can contract for employment and spend their earnings as they may see fit.

Mrs. E. M. G., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a husband or wife can legally disinherit children by will, and that they can dispose of a life estate in their property, by will, to each other if they so desire. We think that in drawing a will some local attorney or other competent person should be employed to draw, and attend to the execution or signing of same as the proper legal requirements must be complied with in order that same shall be of any value.

Mrs. J. E. McM., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your mother, leaving no will, and leaving your father and yourself as her only heirs at law and next of kin her real estate would descend one half to each; but that in case her husband was your stepfather and you are a daughter by a former marriage, your stepfather's share would be limited to a one quarter interest; we think her husband would receive all articles of apparel and ornament and household goods and other personal property to the value of two hundred dollars, the balance of the personal property going in the same way as the real estate.

Mrs. F. H., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your father had a legal right to transfer all his property to his second wife if he saw fit to do so, and that such a transfer would be legal and binding as against the inheritance rights of a child, provided, of course, he possessed mental capacity and no undue influence was exercised upon him causing him to make such transfer.

Mrs. H. R. H., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving surviving a widow and three children, as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would receive one third of the estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, regardless of whether they are children of the surviving widow or by a former wife; we think any person in interest can, in the proper action, compel the sale or division of the real estate and in case of a sale the division of the net proceeds of sale.

A. G., Kansas.—Under the laws of South Dakota we are of the opinion that a married woman may dispose of all of her separate property by will without the consent of her husband.

H. A. C., Arkansas.—We think the woman who married a man who had another wife, from whom he was not divorced, living, should bring an action to have such marriage annulled; we think the man would be liable to be punished for contracting such bigamous marriage; we think the first steps to take to punish such an act would be to have the man arrainged before a magistrate or on a complaint to your prosecuting attorney.

Mrs. M. O. D., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will and leaving no issue, her husband would receive her whole estate.

Mrs. C. H., Washington.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that all children of legitimate birth bear their father's last name, and that strictly speaking the stepfather's name is not the legal name of a child whose own father died during such child's infancy; in practise, however, we think that a stepchild often adopts or uses the stepfather's name, and we do not think the child could be punished for so doing if the stepfather does not object.

Mrs. H. D. A., North Carolina.—We do not think the loss of a duly recorded mortgage or note would defeat your collection of your claim, provided, of course, you can prove the money is still due you, and has not been paid, we think if your debtor refuses to pay you upon demand you should get a certified copy of the mortgage and bring an action against him to enforce the collection of the same and to prove the loss of the original; we think the loss of the papers may inconvenience you, but that you should be able to prove your claim; we think you were wise to have the mortgage recorded as otherwise it would be harder to prove.

Mrs. E. K. M., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the wife's interest in her husband's real estate is limited to a one third interest in case she survives him and to such property as he possessed during the marriage, and which has not been sold on execution or other judicial sale, and to which she has made no relinquishment of her right.

Miss D. B., North Dakota.—We think it would be very difficult for your brother to collect any substantial amount of damages from the man, who in a moment of passion, wrongfully accused your brother of shooting his dog.

Mrs. P. Z., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion: that children can be disinherited by will but that such children as may be born after the making of a will would receive the same share as in case of intestacy; we think that in case decedent leaves no will the children of two marriages have equal shares in such decedent's estate; we think such property as the husband may give and transfer to his wife during lifetime would become the wife's property and not form any part of the husband's estate; we think the wife has a perfect right to forgive her husband for his misconduct if she sees fit to do so.

United States Leads World.—The wealth of the United States is now not far from double that of any other country on earth, according to Sir George Parish of the Statist. He figures that the increase in wealth of the four chief nations in the last century has been 580 per cent in Britain, 400 per cent in France, 700 per cent in Germany and 8,500 per cent in the United States. He gives the wealth of the United States as $150,000,000,000. The increase in population in these four countries in the last century has been as follows: 130 per cent in Britain, 33 per cent in France, 180 per cent in Germany and 1,125 per cent in the United States. The annual savings of the United States was given as $4,000,000,000; of Britain, $2,000,000,000; of Germany, $1,500,000; and of France as $1,000,000,000. Thus, the statistics show that the United States leads the world.

SEND FOR THIS FREE BOOK ON RUPTURE

And Become a Perfect Man

RUPTURE Is a handicap. If you don't realize it now you will sooner or later. It never gets well of itself, but gets worse from time to time. It will eventually unfit you for work and life's battles. It positively grows dangerous—think of the hundreds of people that yearly sacrifice their lives to strangulation.

The past has proven that the old-fashioned antiquated truss and appliance won't help you—it can't; its construction is all wrong. A new star of hope has arisen for the ruptured—a natural outcome from the deficiencies of the past. There is hope, joy and comfort awaiting you.

The "Schuiling Rupture Lock" is a wonderful invention for rupture—the outcome of years of study, hard work and diligent research. It is away from the old lines of truss construction, and holds the rupture exactly the way Nature intends, so that she may heal the opening without interference.

Guaranteed to Hold
Sent on 30 Days Trial

In wearing my Rupture Lock you have absolute protection at all times. You may do any kind of work and get in any position under any condition. We will prove this, by a 30 DAY TRIAL. That's the length of time you should have. A few days trial can never bring out the merits of any article. Thirty days is the only fair way. That's why we insist, to give it the full, real test so you may appreciate what a perfect Rupture holding Lock it really is. If it does not prove all we claim after the required test, it will not cost you a cent.

The Real Secret of Healing Rupture

To successfully co-operate with Nature in the work of healing, the supporting device must be so constructed that the rupture retaining partoverlaps and draws together the breached opening instead of pressing directly into it.

The trusses of today are sadly lacking in this quality. They nearly all give that direct pressure into the opening, which can not help but enlarge it, making it that much harder to retain the bowel later on, resulting in uncontrollable rupture with serious complications.

The Schuiling Rupture Lock was invented to overcome just such faults. It is made to comply with Nature's laws and reach the objective point by the safest and shortest possible route. That it has succeeded is best told by the thousands who are now singing its praises in every corner of our land. This is the Rupture Lock that you get on a 30 Day Trial.

Write for My Free Book at Once

It tells you all about getting rid of your rupture. It teems with interesting experiences of former rupture sufferers. It tells why physicians are recommending this Rupture Lock instead of advising dangerous operations. It tells you why the U. S. War Department orders this Rupture Lock for the gallant boys of '61. It gives you much advice and many facts about rupture that you never heard or read about, also tells you how to order the 30 Days Trial.

Send me the coupon, or, still easier, just drop me a postal card with your full address, and the book will be sent you promptly by return mail.

Premo Camera FREE
For a Club of only 12

One Film Pack Containing 12 Films and Complete Instruction Book Also Included Free in This Great Offer

Of course you know what the "Premo" Camera is so we feel it is hardly necessary to tell you that it is a strictly high grade camera—one that you can depend upon to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. You probably know that with most low-priced cameras the main trouble is that you get a real good picture only once in a while, but not so with the "Premo Junior" which gives you a perfect picture always under any and all conditions, in strong sunlight or in cloudy weather it makes no difference. The "Premo" takes a large and beautifully clear picture 2 1-4 x 3 1-4 inches, is handsomely leather covered, fitted with a reliable quick action lens, automatic shutter adapted for either snap shots or time exposures and has two brilliant view finders so that pictures may be taken either the long way or short way of the camera. The "Premo" also uses a film pack containing twelve films each one of which may be used and developed as soon as exposed without disturbing those left in any way. This film pack can be put in the camera and taken out again in broad daylight, thus doing away with the necessity of going to a dark room every time you want to load it. We know that there must be thousands of COMFORT readers, old and young, who have been waiting for just this opportunity to secure a real good camera without paying a big price for it so we are prepared to give thousands of them away absolutely free as a premium. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also include one film pack containing twelve films and an instruction book, all packed together in a strong compact box and sent to you free by Parcel Post, prepaid, on the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of twelve 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each we will send you by Parcel Post prepaid the "Premo Junior" Camera with one film Pack containing twelve films and complete Instruction Book. Premium No. 614.

Thousands Of Dollars In Cash Prizes For The Winners In COMFORT'S Grand Prize Contest!

Start NOW If You Want To Win YOUR Share Of The Prize Money Which We Will Distribute Among COMFORT'S Readers This Season. Contest Is Now On So GET BUSY!

EACH AND every month of the six months beginning with November 1914 and ending with April 1915 we shall award a series of Cash Prizes to those of our readers who send in the most 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT during each month. At the close of the contest April 1915 we shall further distribute 44 Grand Cash Prizes ranging from $5.00 to $150.00 to the 44 contestants who send in the most subscriptions during the entire six months. Also we shall pay 525 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each to women who enter the contest and fail to win a regular monthly prize. The prizes for each month will be paid on the 8th day of the month following and the names of the prize winners will be announced in COMFORT month by month. Subscriptions sent in during October will be counted on the November Cash Prizes.

You Cannot Lose—You Get Your Premiums Sure

From now on any club you send in will bring you a fine premium sure and may help win a Cash Prize for you also because the same clubs you get up for any of our premiums are also placed to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and Grand Prizes too. It only remains for you to send in enough subscriptions to win a Cash Prize any one month or each month for the six months. And remember that every Monthly Prize you win puts you just so much nearer one of the Grand Prizes to be awarded at the close of the contest April 1915. And you still get your regular club premiums just the same. All this money which you may easily win if you will but make the effort is extra and in addition to the premiums which you may select from our catalogue or any issue of COMFORT and which will be sent to you immediately upon receipt of every club you send in.

How Monthly Prizes Double

If you win a monthly prize one month we pay you at once; if you win any monthly prize the next month we pay you double the amount of your second month's prize, and we will continue to pay you double each successive month that you continue to win any monthly prize. The doubling begins with December.

How Monthly Prizes Thribble

If you win the same Monthly Prize three months in succession we pay you double the amount the second month and three times the amount the third month and we continue to pay you three times the amount each successive month that you continue to win the same monthly prize. If, however, you should win the first monthly prize each month for the whole six months, then we will pay you four times the amount of that prize the fourth month, five times the amount the fifth month and six times the amount the sixth month. The thribbling begins with January.

The Consolation Prizes

In addition to the regular Monthly Prizes we shall also in November award 75 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each, and in the months of December, January, February and March 100 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each and in April 50 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each to such women entering the Monthly Contests of those months and failing to win as we think worthy of reward for their unsuccessful efforts. Remember however that these Consolation Prizes do not double or thribble like the Monthly Prizes.

Opening and Closing Dates

Each Monthly Contest (after November) opens on the first day of the month and ends at midnight of the last day of the same month. If you mail Subscriptions on the last day of a month they will be counted to your credit in the contest for that month, providing the postmark on the envelope shows it. This gives an equal opportunity to all of our readers who enter these contests no matter how far off they live. The monthly prizes, each month, are paid to those who send in the most 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT during the particular month for which the prizes are offered, the first monthly prize for the largest number of subscriptions, the second Monthly Prize for the next largest number, and so on down the list for the month.

917 Cash Prizes In All!

EVERY ONE of the Cash Prizes offered in this contest will actually be paid to the men, women, boys and girls who enter and who send in a sufficient number of subscriptions to COMFORT before April 30, 1915. No partiality will be shown to any contestant. Every subscription sent in by you will, if you so desire, be placed to your credit on the Monthly Prizes and Grand Prizes also and whatever prize you win each month will be paid to you in money promptly at the end of the month in which you win it. And at the close of the contest if there is also a Grand Cash Prize coming to you it will be paid to you immediately after the closing date. There will be no unfair treatment, no waiting, no disappointments for you in this contest. You will be given a square deal first, last and all the time. But when sending your subscriptions be sure to say you want them entered to your credit on the cash prizes otherwise we will not know that you are in the contest. Remember You Can Win As Easily As They Did If You Start Now!

How The Grand Prizes Are to be Awarded

Promptly at the close of the contest April 30, 1915 we shall also award 44 Grand Prizes as published elsewhere on this page. The Capital Grand Prize of $150.00 will go to the contestant who sends in the largest number of 25-cent subscriptions from the first day of October 1914 to the last day of next April. The second Grand Prize of $100 will go to the contestant who sends in the next largest number and so on. Remember these Grand Prizes come on top of the Monthly Prizes and the premiums that you are sure of anyway. Please bear in mind that you do not have to stay in the contest the entire six months in order to win a Grand Cash Prize. In addition to your Monthly Prize you may also win a Grand Prize in a single month—the first month, last month or any other month. Several contestants have done this in our previous contests.

How The Money Piles up Under The Doubling and Thribbling Process

Start right now with the resolve that you will win a Cash Prize the first month sure, then start early for the next Month's Prizes for if you win any Monthly Prize the first month any Monthly Prize you win the next month will double for you. Even if you win only a One Dollar Monthly Prize for any one month then the next month you win a Five Dollar Prize—that $5.00 Prize will double and bring you $10.00. Or if you win a $10.00 Prize it will bring you $20.00 and so on up to the $30.00 Prize which doubled will bring you $60.00. Just think of it! A one Dollar Monthly Prize won by you one month may lead to a $60.00 Prize next month. Isn't that something worth working for? And remember that if you win the same Monthly Prize three months in succession it doubles for you the second month and thribbles for you the third month. Just figure it out for yourself how the money piles up under this doubling and thribbling process. Take the $5.00 Prize for instance—if you win it three months in succession you will have won a grand total of $80.00 in addition to your premiums and any Grand Prize which also may be awarded to you at the close of the contest.

Small Clubs Win The Prizes

Remember that small clubs win the Cash Prizes in these contests. Contrary to what you may have believed and what some people may try to tell you, you don't have to send in big clubs and lots of clubs in order to win the Monthly Prizes and perhaps a Grand Prize also in addition to your regular club premiums. Lots of people in our last year's contest carried off prizes month after month with clubs as small as 15 subscriptions, 20 subscriptions and so on up to 25 subscriptions. You are just as likely to be as fortunate in this contest, but of course you realize that the more subscriptions you send in each month, the better will be your chances.

You May win as Much as $780

The contestant who wins the first Monthly Prize each month for the entire six months will of course also win the Capital Grand Prize of $150.00 thereby winning a total of $780.00. To this fortunate contestant we will pay $30.00 for November, $60.00 for December, $90.00 for January, $120 for February, $150 for March and $180 for April which amounts to $630 and this added to the Capital Grand Prize of $150 makes the splendid sum of $780.

Rules and Conditions—Please Read Carefully!

1. Send subscription clubs, large or small, as often as you like. Name the club premiums you want.
2. In mailing subscriptions intended for the prize competition, be sure to address them all to COMFORT Prize Department, Augusta, Maine, or we shall not know they are for the prize contest.
3. Subscriptions mailed on last day of a month will be counted into that month's contest provided the postmark on the envelope shows it. This makes it fair for all, no matter how far off they live.
4. The prizes will be awarded on the basis of fifteen-month subscriptions, but other subscriptions will be accepted and counted in this prize contest as follows: A 50-cent three-year subscription equals two fifteen-month subscriptions. One two-year renewal equals one fifteen-month subscription. So send in either kind of COMFORT subscriptions or renewals and they will all count.
5. In case of a tie, the prize or prizes for which contestants are tied will be divided equally between them. Thus, if two are tied for first prize, we shall add first and second prizes together and give half of the total to each, and double the share of either contestant entitled to double.

Large Shaggy Teddy Bear

The Best Playmate A Boy or Girl Ever Had

10 Inches High And Full Jointed

FREE FOR A CLUB OF TWO!

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" looks exactly as you see him in the picture above. He is a big shaggy fellow, nearly a foot tall, made of rich, handsome brown plush, paws lined with felt, carefully stitched and finished and his head, arms and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit up, stand on his head, go on all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "Teddy" is so well made that no matter how roughly he is handled he cannot become broken and with ordinary care should last for years. Teddy Bears like this one generally cost a good round sum in the stores, but as we have imported a large quantity of them from Germany at a special low price we can well afford to give them away on terms so liberal that there is no reason why every boy and girl should not have one of them at once. We will send you "Teddy" free if you will accept the following special

Club Offer. For a club of only two 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this big shaggy Teddy Bear free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 699.

European War Stops Importation Of Dolls

And Our Stock Is Nearly Exhausted!

No More Dolls After This Lot Is Gone !!!!

Don't Put Off Getting Up Your Club. We Have Less Than Three Thousand Dolls On Hand.

Send For YOUR Doll NOW

It Is Your Last Chance To Get A Dressed Doll FREE!

WE feel that it is our duty to inform all COMFORT readers that owing to the great European conflict there is going to be a doll famine in this country within the next few weeks. No dolls have been imported into the United States since the European War began and no dolls can be imported until the war is over and no one knows when that will be. What few dolls there are in the stores in this country today will be sold for high prices that are beyond the reach of the ordinary wage earner. It is going to be a doll-less Christmas for thousands of little tots this year and realizing this fact we think it best to admit that we have on hand but a limited quantity of the big, beautiful talking and sleeping dolls which we imported from Germany before the war broke out and only those of our readers who send in their club orders at once will make sure of getting one of these dolls before our stock is completely exhausted. This is the same doll which has delighted thousands of little girls in homes where COMFORT goes—a handsome, fully dressed, life size, talking and sleeping doll, nearly a foot and a half tall with a beautiful picture hat of latest style, handsome lace-and-ribbon trimmed gown and complete wardrobe of pretty lace-trimmed underwear, elegant openwork stockings and dainty low shoes with bright, shiny buckles. She says "Papa" and "Mamma" just as plain as can be, closes her blue eyes and goes to sleep when you lay her down and is wide awake again the minute you pick her up. Her cheeks are like red rosies, her beautiful golden hair hangs in long clustering curls and she shows her pearly white teeth in one of the prettiest smiles you ever saw. She can be dressed and undressed as often as you wish and is so well made with fine bisque head and strong body that she cannot possibly become broken if you take good care of her. Remember we have only a limited quantity of these dolls on hand—less than three thousand in fact—and that while they last it is going to be a case of first come, first served. If you put this off you may have to buy a doll and pay a war price for it; indeed, the stock in the stores may be completely sold out before you get around to it, so to be on the safe side you had better send in your club right away. Following is our free offer. Read it and start getting up your club today.

Club Offer. For a club of only six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you free by Parcel Post prepaid this beautiful fully dressed, talking and sleeping doll, carefully packed in a strong box so that she positively will not get broken. Premium No. 621.

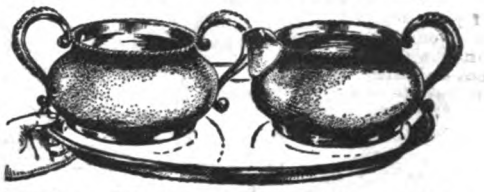
Six Rogers' Silver Spoons

Warranted to Wear Ten Years

Given for Club of Four Subscribers



Guaranteed each and every one to be Strictly Pure A 1 Brand made by the famous Wm. A. Rogers and every teaspoon is so stamped on back.

This silverware comes in the popular Grape or Vintage Pattern, which is the very latest and prettiest design in Silverware. The picture hardly shows you the great beauty of the dainty, bright, clean clusters of Ripe Grapes or the finely executed leaves growing on the delicate vine seen on the front and back of every spoon. Rogers' Silverware has a world-wide reputation. We can hardly add more. These A 1 Rogers' teaspoons are guaranteed to be full standard extra plate upon the finest quality of 18% nickel silver base, and with ordinary care will last ten years. Some families are using Rogers' ware twice this time.

Everybody loves new, bright silverware. Nobody ever had too much, especially of Wm. A. Rogers' manufacture, as the expense has always and is now, too high, but COMFORT'S plan for sub premium workers make it possible to not only own these six Rogers' teaspoons free but the entire set of table spoons, dessert spoons, knives and forks, sugar shell and butter knife, all in the same delightful grape or vintage pattern to match, without costing you really a penny.

First send in your four subs to COMFORT at 25c each and receive this set of six Rogers' teaspoons by Parcel Post, then later earn the entire set of Rogers' Silverware to match the spoons. You can do it just as easily for only a few more COMFORT subscriptions as per new plan we will tell you about after you get the 6 spoons. From, No. 386. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Quadruple Silver Plated SUGAR, CREAMER & TRAY

A Dainty Gift For Mother, Wife or Sister

This handsome silver set of three pieces consists of a Sugar, Creamer and Tray, each piece quadruple plated with pure coin silver, gold lined, and warranted to wear for years. The Creamer is of the elegant design shown in above illustration nearly two inches high and 2 1-4 inches in diameter at top, with a beautiful floral decoration engraved on the side which does not show in the picture. The bottom is plain and bright polished the sides and handle are finished with the frosted effect which is so much admired by everybody and top and handle are heavily beaded. This same description also applies to the Sugar which is of the same good size and fitted with two beautiful beaded handles instead of one. The large and handsome Tray is 61-2 inches in diameter quadruple plated with pure silver, plain and bright polished. Remember, this is not a cheap "electro plated" set but one which will last you for years. The heavy quadruple plate being sufficiently thick to withstand constant use without showing any signs of tarnish or wear. We know that every lady or girl who receives this set from us will be simply delighted with it for aside from its usefulness it is certainly a beautiful ornament for dining table or sideboard. Better order one of these sets right away for yourself or to give as a present to mother, sweetheart, wife or sister. She will most assuredly appreciate it. We will send you this beautiful set consisting of Sugar, Creamer and Tray exactly as described above on the terms of the following special CLUB OFFER. For a club of only four 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two three-years subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this elegant quadruple plated Sugar, Creamer and Tray free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 620.

Handsome, New Style, Guaranteed Watch

A Warranted Timekeeper—Best American Movement—Stem Wind and Set.

Here is a watch that any man or boy may feel proud to carry, not alone on account of its handsome, refined appearance, but, because it is always on the dot—a splendid, dependable timekeeper that will keep as near perfect time as any watch you ever saw no matter what the price. Of course, this is not an expensive watch because it is not in a gold or silver case but for practical every-day use it is just as good as any watch costing from $20.00 to $25.00. In fact, we have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee which is just as binding as that given with any watch no matter what make. It has a handsome polished nickel case with an unusually thick crystal which will stand all sorts of rough handling without becoming broken; the movement is the best American made, stem wind and stem set, the dial is pure white with large plain easily read figures on its face and, as shown in the illustration, it has the hour, minute and second hands like all high-priced watches. We have already given away thousands of these watches without having one of them returned to us or receiving a single complaint and this we think is sufficient evidence that it never fails to please and satisfy. Now is the time for you to secure one of these handsome, guaranteed watches before the price of them goes up as it is pretty sure to do in the near future. We will send you this watch exactly as described, together with a handsome stylish chain and fob, if you will accept the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only five 15-months subscribers to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this guaranteed watch, also a handsome chain and fob, free by Parcel Post, prepaid. Premium No. 399. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

31-Piece Princess Violet Dinner Set

Free And Express Prepaid For A Club Of 12

THIS splendid set of dishes is full size for family use and consists of 6 Plates, 6 Cups, 6 Saucers, 6 Cerial or Fruit Dishes, 6 Individual Butters and large Meat Platter all handsomely decorated with clusters of purple wood violets surrounded with rich green foliage and bordered with lovely tracings of gold. Unlike the ordinary dishes that are usually offered as premiums, every piece in this magnificent set is (with the exception of the decorations) snowy white in color, dainty in design, light in weight and finish with a Haviland glaze which gives it that smooth, velvety appearance so much admired by every woman. The decorations will last a lifetime because being burned into the ware and underneath the glaze it positively will not wash, rub or wear off. Our illustration does not give you any idea of the real beauty of these dishes because it fails to show up the pleasing color combination of purple, green and gold which is so finely set off by the flawless white of the ware itself. This is by far the handsomest, daintiest dinner set we have ever offered to COMFORT readers and we are positive that it will more than please every woman who secures one of them on the terms of our very liberal offer. No matter where you live, we will ship you this set direct from the pottery in Ohio by express, all charges prepaid and guaranteed against breakage. If you find any piece or pieces cracked or broken when you receive your set, we will send you free and prepaid new pieces in their place so you may feel sure of owning the set complete and best of all without a cent of expense.

OUR FREE OFFER For a club of only twelve 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome 31-Piece Violet Decorated Dinner Set carefully packed to prevent breakage, by express all charges prepaid. Premium No. 461.

BIG Christmas Stockings brimful of presents for the little folks and older children as well. COMFORT is going to play Santa Claus this year and distribute hundreds of these Christmas stockings among its readers who have little ones for whom Christmas Trees and Santa Claus Gifts must be provided at all cost. The contents of the stockings vary a little but the general assortment remains practically the same and you may be sure of receiving as many presents as are herewith illustrated. Each stocking contains just the gifts that delight the hearts of boys and girls—rattles, horns, dolls, whistles, musical flies, harmonicas, imitation watches, toy dishes, marbles, tops, bugles, cut-out paper dolls and dolls' dresses, beads and other pleasing holiday novelties. The stockings are large size, being nearly a foot and a half long and all the presents are regular size, much larger than they appear to be in the accompanying illustration. Sweet tinkling Christmas bells and ribbon bows decorate each Stocking and there is also attached a handsome embossed Christmas Card upon which is printed "Merry Christmas from Santa Claus" or some similar inscription. If you have no children of your own to make happy this Christmas you probably know of somebody's little boy or girl who would be delighted with one or more of these Big Christmas Stockings, so you should not fail to take advantage of this offer at once, as Christmas is almost here and besides our supply of the stockings is limited and they may be all gone before your order reaches us unless you send it in at once.

Our Christmas Offer. For a club of only TWO new 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one of these Big Christmas Stockings full of Santa Claus Gifts free by Parcel Post prepaid. Remember our supply is limited, so you should send us your order early to avoid disappointment and delay. Premium No. 658.

26-Piece Daisy Silver Set

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Six

WE have in the past made many fine premium offers of silverware to readers of COMFORT, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete silver set in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think because we are giving away this splendid set on such liberal terms that it is the ordinary cheap silverware which is plated on a brass base and consequently changes color and has that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is silver plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will never show signs of tarnish or wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use; the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept our offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, you will receive this 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

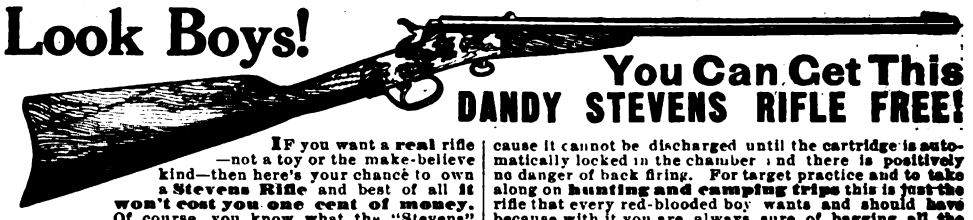
Whose Little Girl Wants ME? I Am The Cutest Sweetest Baby Doll In Toyland And You Can Have Me FREE!

YES, this beautiful, curly-haired doll is free to any little girl and on such liberal terms that we expect to give away thousands of them during the next few months. Don't think she is anywhere near as small as she looks to be in the picture for she stands nearly a foot and a quarter high. She has a real kid body and her beautiful head is almost indestructible because it is made of bisque. You can make her stand up or sit down in a chair, or bend over or assume all sorts of natural positions because her arms are jointed at shoulder and elbow and her legs at hip and knee. When you lie her down she closes her eyes and goes to sleep and when you pick her up she is wide awake again. Her beautiful brown hair hangs in luxuriant curls, her eyes are blue as the sky, she has real eyelashes—not the "make-believe" kind—and taken altogether she is certainly the cutest and sweetest baby doll in all toyland. With exception of her handsome black openwork lace stockings and cunning little slippers with bow and buckle she comes to you undressed so that you can make your own dresses for her and dress and undress her to your heart's content. Fathers and Mothers—just look at this beautiful doll in the picture as she stands smiling with arms outstretched waiting for someone to pick her up, hug her, kiss her and put on her gay little dress! Don't you think your little girl would just love to have her for her own? We will send her to you free packed in a strong box so she cannot possibly get broken if you will accept the terms of the following special offer.



For Only Six Subscriptions!

FOR A club of only six 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each we will send you this handsome Doll exactly as described by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 466.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE! This is the same doll which we formerly offered for a club of four. Owing to the scarcity and high prices of dolls brought about by the European War, we are obliged to raise the offer to a club of six. Please bear this fact in mind when ordering the above doll and remember that our former offer has been withdrawn and that from now on we cannot give this doll for a club of less than six 15-month subscriptions at 25 cents each or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each.

Look Boys! You Can Get This DANDY STEVENS RIFLE FREE!

IF you want a real rifle —not a toy or the make-believe kind—then here's your chance to own a Stevens Rifle and best of all it won't cost you one cent of money. Of course, you know what the "Stevens" Rifle is. It is acknowledged to be one of the very best makes in the world manufactured by the famous Stevens Firearms Co. of Massachusetts. The rifle we offer you here is their "Little Scout" model and is the take-down pattern—that is by simply turning a screw you can remove the barrel from the stock which is a great help in cleaning the gun or packing it for travel. It shoots C. B. caps, .22 short, .22 long, or .22 long rifle rimfire cartridges, has an 18-inch round all-steel barrel, case-hardened frame, blued steel butt plate, German silver knife-edge front and open rear sights, polished black walnut stock and weighs 2½ pounds. This rifle is absolutely safe because it cannot be discharged until the cartridge is automatically locked in the chamber and there is positively no danger of back firing. For target practice and to take along on hunting and camping trips this is just the rifle that every red-blooded boy wants and should have because with it you are always sure of bagging all the small game that comes your way such as rabbits, squirrels, hawks and all kinds of game birds. We want every boy who reads this offer to have one of these splendid rifles and we are going to make it very easy for you to get one without spending a cent for it. Here's our free offer. Just read it.

Club Offer. For a club of only twelve 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this genuine Stevens Rifle free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 698.

Wonderful New Photo-Button Camera

Will Produce A Finished Picture In Two Minutes

Premium No. 703

Sent You Prepaid For A Club Of Four!

Just think of it! A camera with which you can take, develop and finish a picture in just two minutes. To you this may seem impossible, but it is true nevertheless. Think of the amusement and pleasure to be had taking photographs of your friends and neighbors with this camera and deliver them the finished pictures while they wait. And the beauty of it all is, this wonderful camera does all the work itself. You don't have to know anything about photography in order to take pictures with this camera—you don't need to spend money fitting up a dark room and buying ruby lights and chemicals and the dozens of other conveniences which are absolutely necessary to have with the ordinary camera. This new Photo-Button camera does away with all that trouble and expense because you can take, develop and finish the pictures in broad daylight. You can commence to take pictures just as soon as you receive it, for we also give you a complete outfit consisting of One Dozen Plates, One Dozen Brooch Frames, a Bottle of developing fluid, developing tank and complete instructions how to go ahead and be successful from the very start. You can then take pictures of any of your folks or your friends, or of the old pet horse, dog, cat, cow or anything else you wish to make a portrait of and you can mount the pictures in the pretty Brooch Button frames like those illustrated above. Remember there is nothing difficult about operating this camera and that with the camera we send you everything you need with which to commence taking pictures at once. And after you have used up what plates, brooch frames and developer we give you, you can send to us for another supply and they will cost you no money because we have the extra plates and everything else in stock and can let you have them free in return for one, two or three new 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT, according to what you order and how much. Or, of course if you prefer, we will sell you the plates, developer, etc., very cheap for cash, much cheaper than what the same article would cost you in any store. This is one of the most wonderful offers we have ever made. That we are able to offer this camera for such a small club to COMFORT may seem very strange to you, but if you send for it we guarantee that you will be more than pleased with it because you will find it exactly as illustrated and described in this offer. You may have this Camera and Complete Outfit without paying a cent, if you will accept the following

CLUB OFFER. For only four 15-month subscription to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-year subscription at 50 cents each, we will send you this Photo-Button Camera and Complete Outfit Free by Parcel Post prepaid.

Great Japanese Rug about Six Feet Long

Given For a Club of Only Four

This unusual offering was gotten of a large importing house who make a specialty in dealing in big quantities of these Rotan or Matting Rugs. It is closely woven of fine Japanese matting and is thus strong and durable. It has an elaborate Oriental design, which is brought out by the bright colors being interwoven with the finely shaded texture of the matting itself, of which our illustration gives but a faint idea. The colors are of such a blend and are so harmonious in the variegated shades of red, blue and green that it is appropriate to use in any room in the house, especially for the chambers or living-room. It will lay closely to the floor or fit nicely over a defaced carpet. They are of such good size, about 72 inches long and thirty-six inches wide, that two of them make a good covering for the floor of a fair sized room. They are a very serviceable rug to use as they do not easily soil and can be readily cleaned with a damp cloth and the color design thus be kept fresh and bright. It is guaranteed to give entire satisfaction and if you once have one of these rugs come into your home you will almost be compelled to get up another club and secure more of them, they are given on such easy terms and are so entirely wearable and give such a fine appearance.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only four 15-months subscribers to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will deliver one of these Rugs by Parcel Post. Prem. No. 420. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Big Box Initial Stationery, Envelopes And Complete Writing Outfit

If, in place of this illustration, we could actually show you this splendid assortment of handsome high grade embossed monogram initial stationery with envelopes to match and complete outfit of everything you need to write with, you would not believe it possible for us to make such an offer. However, that is just what we are doing and you will miss a big bargain if you don't take advantage of it at once. It is now the height of fashion and evidence of the very best taste to use stationery with your own monogram initial or "crest" on it, so in this big outfit we have arranged to give you two dozen sheets pure white linen stationery 10 1-2 x 6 1-4 inches in size, each sheet beautifully embossed in dainty colors with any monogram initial you desire, two dozen envelopes, two combination sheets guide lines and blotters, same size as stationery, and a complete outfit of writing materials consisting of memorandum tablet with pencil, combination penholder, one dozen best quality steel pens one pencil, one combination pencil and eraser and a handsomely decorated and embossed metal tray. The complete outfit being packed in a tasty box and sent to you by Parcel Post prepaid. You would have to pay many visits to the stores to get together such a splendid assortment of writing material as this and pay a big price for it in the bargain, but COMFORT is always able to buy direct from the manufacturers at wholesale prices and this tells the story how we can afford to give you such big value as a premium for a very small club to COMFORT. Just think how nice it will be when writing to your friends to have your own letter crest monogram initial embossed in colors on this high grade fine quality stationery. Remember you get one full quire of choice paper and twenty-four envelopes besides all the other articles in this complete writer's outfit so don't hesitate to send for this premium today because you will surely be delighted with it. It is yours free upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only two 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this splendid Writing Outfit exactly as pictured and described above free as a premium. When ordering be sure to specify what monogram initial you want. Premium No. 382.

Three-Piece Nottingham Lace Bed Set

Given Free And Sent By Parcel Post Prepaid For A Club Of Six.

Premium No. 702

WE believe that there is nothing much more desired and appreciated by the average woman than a handsome and serviceable bed set so we have just purchased a quantity of the Three-piece Nottingham Lace Set shown in above illustration and will distribute them free as a premium among lady readers of COMFORT. Our illustration cannot, of course show the real appearance of the set but it gives you an idea of the design which is a beautifully executed array of flowers, bow knots and ribbons scattered on a mounting of Duchess Lace and set off by Festoon effects on all sides. The material is Nottingham Lace substantially woven for strength in laundering and finished with buttonhole stitched scalloped edges for added strength and convenience in cleaning and stretching. The spread is 72 inches wide to 90 inches long which is large enough to cover a full size bed and leave a valance effect to hang over on the sides. The two shams are each 28½ inches square. This is really an extraordinary offer when you stop to consider that we are giving away this set for a club of only six subscriptions, but please do not think that because we do offer it for such a small club that it is cheap in any sense of the word, because the material is of the very best and it is made and finished in the finest possible manner on the latest improved looms in the largest lace mill in the United States. This same bed set is on sale in the stores at a good round price, but because we buy direct and eliminate all middlemen's profits, we are enabled to make the following very attractive

Free Offer. For a club of only six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome Three-Piece Nottingham Lace Bed Set exactly as illustrated and described above free by Parcel Post Prepaid.

Crumbs of Comfort

How you live is how you will die.

Don't fool with temptation; you are a fool if you do.

You build hopes on tomorrow and you may never see it.

Many a man has been saved from the devil by a godly wife.

Men's evil deeds live in brass; their virtues we write in water.

Some men ten feet away can't tell their wives from other women.

Some churches are not much more than cold-storage warehouses.

The love of gambling will corrupt the best principles on earth.

Stop trying to be decent in public and acting like a brute at home.

If it is right to steal, a man would be pleased to be called a thief.

Education and wealth are not necessary to enter the gates of heaven.

It is as great a point of wisdom to hide ignorance as it is to display knowledge.

Every dollar you own, that you did not give honest value for, has a stain on it.

More have fallen by the edge of the tongue than by the edge of the sword.

Our vision is bad when we cannot see that real good is the good of everybody.

Many a man can't see that a whiskey barrel is more dangerous than a gun barrel.

When a man sees himself as God sees him he will not wonder that God's judgment falls on him.

Though one may become learned by another's learning, he can become wise only by his own wisdom.

It is to him who masters our minds by the force of truth, not to him who enslaves men by violence, that we owe our reverence.

Believe that in His eternal wisdom the Most High has, with His own hand, engraved at the bottom of all hearts natural religion.

Hearts and Wires

By Etta Webb

OLD Mrs. Fife was taking the second part of her every morning journey. The first part had led from her bedroom to the breakfast-room. The second part led from the breakfast-room to her sitting-room. She was taking this second part now.

Old Mrs. Fife was very old. She never told her age but people did not have to be told to know that she must be on the wrong side of eighty. She was very fat—cumbersomely fat and of that brief stature which makes embonpoint so distressing. She had to place her feet carefully when she walked. She held her chin high and kept her hands folded before her. Her hands were beautiful—soft, small and delightfully white. These beautiful hands had survived charmingly the wear and tea of time. They hinted to you of that perfection of grace and loveliness which long ago had made old Mrs. Fife the reigning belle of her community.

The second half of old Mrs. Fife's journey flowed pleasantly over fieldy spaces of Shirvan rugs, between dull mahogany tables, past a great carved davenport and a cabinet where shining shelves were laden with the interesting flotsam and jetsam of a life full of means and with a discriminating love of the uselessly beautiful. It ended at a great winged chair drawn close beside a large square table. Upon the table lay in neat order the morning letters, the newspapers, the last magazines, and journals and a row of new books in a hammered silver rack. There also was a writing tablet, paper, ink and pens if she chose to write a note. And if she chose not to write but to speak a telephone equipment stood at her elbow and she had but to lift the receiver. So you will see that old Mrs. Fife's pleasant journey ended in a still more pleasant destination. She sighed with contentment as she lowered herself into the winged chair.

At that instant the telephone-bell at her elbow tinkled an agreeable surprise. Old Mrs. Fife took down the receiver listened and acknowledged the salute of the bell.

"Hello!" she said.

Over the wire came a voice as smooth and sweet and singy as the note of a violin. It tickled old Mrs. Fife's ear pleasantly. She liked music, knew it well and could determine its quality wherever heard. This voice was music. She got a vision of youth, joyous vitality, shining girlishness, sweetness in abundance. And yet all it said was:

"Here's your party!"

The voice that followed over the wire was like a discord in its abruptness and disillusion.

"Mrs. Fife," it inquired.

"Yes."

"How are you this morning?"

"Quite as usual."

"That's good news. A lovely morning, isn't it?"

"Inanity!" thought Mrs. Fife. "As if I don't know decent weather when I see it," she said: "A lovely morning indeed!"

"I'm afraid I can't get over to see you today," said the affected voice over the wire. "I've got three committee meetings, a tea and a club banquet to attend. And I'm not feeling as well as usual. But I shall think of you, so beautifully quiet with your books and correspondence. Someday I mean to take life more easily." A sigh. "I don't like this being so much in demand but you know how that goes."

"Yes, yes," replied Mrs. Fife, impatiently, "glad to hear from you, my dear, but I won't keep you another minute, come when you can. Good by." She hung up the receiver.

"And that woman expects to get all my money someday!" she thought, savagely.

"If my nephew, Fife Cameron had only lived—but what's the use in wishing for the impossible? I ought to know better at my age. He died and before he died he displeased me greatly. That creature he married—I never saw her of course but I heard enough about her from my friends. I can't help wondering if they ever had any children and what became of her. Fife never dared get in my sight after that day I spoke my mind to him. I was angry and I had a right to be. I'd built all my hopes on him and arranged for him to marry Gwendoling Provost, a girl in his own class, with money if no great sense. And he went back on me. So I went back on him. Gwendoline's going to have my money just the same as though she had been Fife's wife, though she doesn't need it, the Lord knows. I don't love her but at least she's been true to me and her idea of Fife. She hasn't married. What if she does fritter her life out in clubs and things? She's got to have something to do. She hasn't reached the age when she can sit down and fold her hands and wait for dissolution. Ah, me!" Old Mrs. Fife sighed. She picked up a letter, scanned it, tossed it aside. Another—and tossed it aside. Another still—"Good Lord!" she exclaimed, aloud, "I know just what these people say. Haven't they been saying the same things to me for full half a century? Oh, for something new under the sun!" Her eye caught sight of a gay post-card and her face brightened. The person who wrote to her didn't use cheap post-cards for their correspondence. She read the post-card. It bore a brief message in a delicate, unpractised hand.

"Dear Mrs. Fife.—work is slack with me now and anytime you want me to fix that dress you spoke about I can do it. Very truly,
"MRS. CARR."

"Well!" ejaculated Mrs. Fife. She began to look pleased. Here was a distinct, business-like appeal. The woman asked nothing but work, and she did good work, conscientious and painstaking work. She had put the gray foulard which Madame Phanette spoiled into wearable shape. And she was a pleasant thing to have in the house—quiet, fadedly pretty and attentive to her own affairs. Certainly, she should have the black moire to do. She should have it now. Mrs. Fife turned to the telephone. Instantly music filled her ear, music of a single note. Central merely said, "Hello?" Mrs. Fife gave a number. After a moment more music, "Party doesn't answer. I'll try again," Mrs. Fife actually smiled.

"What a delightful voice! She must be a new girl at the central office. How I wish Gwendoline could speak like that. Ah——"

"Here's 772," came over the wire. Then Mrs. Fife heard the sewing-woman's voice.

Midway in the afternoon Mrs. Fife sat again in the winged chair watching the swift, delicate movements or the little, plump, pale woman who sat ripping seams in the black moire. She had known the instant she saw the gown on Mrs. Fife just where it was too tight. She had, it seemed a fine instinct for fitting.

"Phanette forgets that I'm an old woman and that I like to be comfortable," said Mrs. Fife. "And she charges outrageously. I've a good mind to let you make my new brocade, Mrs. Carr. I've never got over my liking for having a dressmaker in the house. If anything goes wrong you know it before it's too late, and then, I may as well confess it, I enjoy watching you at your work."

Mrs. Carr smiled.

"I'll be very glad of the work," she said frankly. "It's necessary that I should earn all I can. My daughter helps all she can but——"

"Your daughter!" exclaimed Mrs. Fife, "I didn't know that you had any children."

"I have Jessie," replied the little sewing-woman calmly. "She works in the telephone office."

Mrs. Fife's mind felt the stimulus of sudden discovery.

"Has she a pretty voice?" she asked.

Mrs. Carr sighed.

"I think she has an unusually pretty voice. She's a good girl too."

"Well," said Mrs. Fife. And she sat thinking pleasantly till the telephone bell interrupted the process. She took down the receiver and heard that voice of music.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Fife. This is Jessie Carr. May I speak to mother?"

"Mrs. Carr," announced Mrs. Fife, "come to the phone. It's your daughter."

Mrs. Carr put aside her work in a flutter and answered the call. She said "hello," "yes" twice and "good by, deary." Her face was radiant as she explained.

"She's ready to go off duty and she wanted to know if she should have supper at half past six. That's all."

"So she can cook," said Mrs. Fife. She lifted a finger and spoke impulsively, "Mrs. Carr, ring up again. Ask her to come here to supper. I invite you both."

Mrs. Fife, for her stomach's sake, had her hearty meal at noon but supper tonight approached very nearly to being a feast. It was spread in the breakfast-room off her private sitting-room. There were extras of course—lots of sweets in honor of the younger guest, for Mrs. Fife remembered her long-lost sweet tooth. Jessie Carr, it was evident, had a healthy girl's appetite and appreciated everything. Mrs. Fife sat back and watched her. It was good to see anyone eat like that. She had gone at her food just so when she was Jessie's age. Nowadays folk were so fickle. Take Gwendoline for instance with her bouillon and toast. Besides, the girl was refreshing to see. She was nineteen and her mother right over, save that every line and curve of her face and figure were strengthened and intensified. Jessie expressed vigor, will-power, good sense in every freckle on her nose, every shiny hair of her head, even the dimple that counteracted the firm set of her jaw. She had astonishingly good manners too. And her voice—it

Monthly Lesson in History

DECEMBER, the last of the quartet of numerically misnamed months, derived its name from the position held by it in in the old Roman calendar—Decem, meaning ten. Before the time of Julius Cæsar, when the year began with March, December was the tenth month. It brings the shortest day and the longest night of the year. Marking the close of the year, it is a period of decadence or old age, cheerless, gloomy and chilly. It is the month of the yuletide and is hallowed as bringing Christmas Day, the Christian festival celebrated in memory of the birth of Christ. While December 25th was in all probability not the actual date of Christ's birth, the selection of this date by both the Eastern and Western churches was by no means arbitrary. In the fourth century the Eastern church transferred its celebration to the same day which was uniformly celebrated. The gem stone symbolic of the month is the turquoise, standing for prosperity, soul cheer; and the ruby, significant of charity, dignity, divine power. In the language of flowers the holly is the representative of the mid-winter month. It stands for domestic happiness, foresight. The approach of the death of the year is recognized by the poets who sang of old and of those who are singing today. "Hail to December, say they all. It gave to earth our Christ," but "the chill December" of Spenser, Poe's "bleak December," Keats' "drear nighted December," and Pope's "cold December" are truly descriptive of the month in most latitudes. Whittier well expressed the sentiment of the month when he said, "The Sun that brief December day rose cheerless over hills of gray." It was a tragic month in the life of Napoleon, having brought his crowning as Emperor, his first embarkation for France, his attempted assassination, the battle of Austerlitz, his elevation to First Consulship, his departure from the army, his divorce from Josephine, and finally the placing of his body in the Invalides.

Day by day some of the principal events of the month throughout the ages were:

1st—Alexander I, Emperor and autocrat of all the Russias, died 1825. December was likewise his birth month.

2nd—Hernan Cortez, conqueror of Mexico, died 1547. John Brown, executed 1859. Napoleon crowned Emperor, 1804. Battle of Austerlitz, 1805.

3rd—Frederick VI, King of Denmark, died 1839.

4th—Thomas Carlyle, born 1795. Cardinal Richelieu, died 1642.

5th—Mozart, died 1792. King George III acknowledged the independence of the United States. President Martin Van Buren, born.

6th—Feast of St. Nicholas celebrated as one of the chief ecclesiastical festivals of Southern Italy.

7th—Cicero, Roman orator, assassinated, 43 B. C. Marshal Ney, general of Napoleon, shot at Paris, 1815.

8th—Mary Queen of Scots, born 1542. Thomas de Quincey, died 1859. John Milton, poet, born, 1608.

10th—Llewellyn, the last native Prince of Wales, killed, 1828.

11th—The Puritans landed at Plymouth, 1620. Charles XII of Sweden killed, 1718. Theodore ex-king of Corsica died, 1756. Imprisoned for debt, he made over to his creditors his kingdom, receiving money with which to meet the obligation and secure his release from prison.

12th—Maria Louisa, second wife of Bonaparte, born 1791. She died during the same month, fifty-six years later.

13th—Ember day.

14th—George Washington, Father of his country, died 1799. Albert, Prince Consort to Queen Victoria died, 1861.

15th—Jerome Bonaparte, youngest brother of Napoleon born, 1784. Josephine, first wife of Bonaparte, divorced, 1784. Isaak Walton died, 1683.

16th—Wilhelm Grimm, writer of fairy tales, died, 1859.

17th—Ludwig Beethoven, composer, born, 1770. Maria Louisa, Duchess of Parma, Empress of France, died, 1847. After the fall of Bonaparte, her husband, the allies made her Duchess of Parma. John G. Whittier born, 1807.

20th—Louis, the Dauphin, father of Louis XVI, died, 1765.

21st—St. Thomas day. The shortest day of the year; the longest night. The seven days preceding and the seven days following the shortest day, or the winter solstice, were by the ancients called the halcyon days. Forefathers' day, observed Dec. 21, celebrates particularly the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth, Mass., in 1620, and was first brought into prominence in New England and the Congregational churches throughout the country. While in no state is it observed as a legal holiday, Forefathers' day is nevertheless revered in many states of the Union and the event which it commemorates is lauded and mentioned in schools, public meetings, banquets and other public and private functions.

22nd—Richard Plantagenet, alleged son of Richard III, died 1550.

23rd—Alexander I, Emperor of Russia, born 1777.

24th—Christmas eve.

25th—Sir Isaac Newton born, 1642.

26th—St. Stephen's day. Battle of Trenton, 1776, when George Washington made the memorable crossing of the Delaware.

27th—St. John's (the Evangelist) day. Charles Lamb, essayist, died 1834.

28th—Holy Innocents' day. Lord Macaulay, historian, died 1859.

30th—Titus, Roman Emperor, born 41 A. D. Richard, Duke of York, killed, 1460.

31st—New Year's eve. "Ring out the old, ring in the new; ring out wild bells, the year is dying."

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Pernicious Attempt to Destroy Competition by Prohibiting the Use of the Mails

WHILE the government is making tremendous efforts to curb the trusts because of their tendency toward monopoly through restraint of trade, there is pending in Congress a bill which can serve no purpose except to destroy competition in the interest of certain large and powerful corporations.

Yet the bill is so framed that the ordinary citizen, unfamiliar with its design and practical effect, would not see through its disguise and would take it to be intended to protect the people from fraud and imposition.

This bill, introduced in both the Senate and House of Representatives, provides that no insurance company shall be permitted to use the mails to do business in any State that prohibits the company from transacting insurance business within the State.

Each State, by its own laws and its own insurance department regulates all insurance business that is transacted through agents within the State—mind you, through agents within the State—which is a proper exercise of State rights. And nearly all insurance companies solicit their business, issue their policies and collect their premiums through local agents. The agents' commissions with the fees exacted by the States for agents' and company licenses add considerably to the expense of insurance business done by this method, and go to swell the premiums paid by the policy holders, so that in the end it all comes out of the people who buy the insurance.

But there is one life insurance company, the Postal Life Insurance Company, that does all its business by mail directly from its home office and employs no local agents, solicitors or collectors, thereby saving the expense of agents' commissions and paying no State license fees. This company, which does a large and successful business in the United States, claims that in consequence of this saving of expense it can afford to sell life insurance at lower rates than its competitors which adhere to the old and more costly method. This is a reasonable proposition the effectiveness of which may be judged by the means invoked by rival companies and their agents to meet it.

It is apparent that the bill, though general in terms, is aimed at this company, and, if enacted by Congress, would put it out of business by making it subject to State laws which, in most if not all the States, require such a company to take out State licenses and do its business through licensed agents resident in the respective States.

The U. S. Post Office authorities recognize that this company's business done by mail from its home office directly with people in other States is inter-State commerce and, as such, is protected by federal law from interference or regulation of any kind by the several States. Therefore, under the U. S. postal laws, as they now are and always have been in this respect, this company can not be refused the use of the mails so long as it conducts its business honestly.

The power to regulate inter-State commerce and the use of the mails belongs, properly and necessarily, to the federal government. To permit each State to determine by whom and on what terms and conditions the mails may be used within its borders would destroy national unity and throw business into a chaotic condition. And yet that is precisely what the proposed bill would accomplish with respect to the insurance business.

The pretense that the bill is designed to protect the people from loss through unsound and fraudulently conducted insurance companies is merely specious. The Postmaster General already has the power to refuse the use of the mails to any person or corporation that conducts a business that is fraudulent or contrary to public policy as defined by Congress.

If the authors and promoters of this bill are sincere in their professed desire to save the "dear" people from being imposed upon through fraudulent insurance by mail-order they should drop the pending bill and substitute one that will prohibit all insurance companies from doing an inter-State business, whether by mail-order or otherwise, unless licensed by the U. S. Department of Commerce and Labor after thorough examination and satisfactory proof of their sound financial standing and business methods. Such a law would be reasonable, beneficial and effective, and might well be extended to include individuals and corporations engaged in other lines of inter-State commerce. This is no new idea, as similar measures have been advocated for some time past. But it would not rid the so-called "old line" insurance companies of the competition of their enterprising rival, for the solvency and honesty of the Postal Life Insurance Company are undoubted. This company was chartered by New York, where it has its home office and conducts its business in conformity with the laws and subject to examination and supervision of the Insurance Commissioner of that State.

There is no reason why insurance business should not be transacted by mail as successfully and satisfactorily as the sale of farm and factory products.

This company, if put out of business by the passage of the pending bill, would not be the only sufferer, for the people would be deprived of the benefit of obtaining life insurance at the favorable rates which it has established.

But there is another reason of much more vital consequence why this bill should be summarily dismissed by Congress.

A Dangerous Entering Wedge for Further Restraint of Mail-Order Trade

THERE are many other great and powerful interests in this country, besides the insurance companies, that would like to be rid of mail-order competition, and have fought hard and are still striving to bring about that result. It was one of the strong opposing forces that we encountered and had to overcome in obtaining the establishment of the parcel post, and it is met every time an effort is made to improve the service or lower the rates for mailable merchandise.

If the bill relating to mail-order insurance business should be adopted as law, it would prove but the entering wedge opening the way for the enactment of a lot of other objectionable laws limiting, restraining or prohibiting the use of the mails for conducting legitimate mail-order business.

Only last winter we received a copy of a proposed bill designed to discourage, impede and restrict mail-order business by burdening it with a heavy special tax and other troublesome incumbrances.

Every unnecessary restraint of legitimate trade impoverishes the people at large and injures the nation as a whole while enriching a favored few and tending to foster dangerous and tyrannical monopolies. That is why the government is prosecuting the trusts.

One of the principal objects of the parcel post is to facilitate and promote mail-order trade. The mail-order method of trading largely increases the shopping facilities of the people in the remote rural sections by putting them in touch with the enormous and varied stocks carried by the great city stores and mail-order houses. If the mail-order business should be cut off they would have to do without many necessary articles that the country stores can't afford to carry and don't carry in stock.

The people generally should, and we hope that COMFORT readers will, write to their Senators and Congressmen in Washington, soon after Congress assembles early this December, and urge their objections to this and any other bill proposing to refuse the use of the mails to any honest insurance company.

The "Unspeakable Turk" Goes Into the War

DEGENERATE, barbarous, bloodthirsty, bankrupt, treacherous Turkey has entered the war as an ally of Germany and Austria and the manner of her entrance is in keeping with her national infamy.

In violation of her declaration of neutrality Turkey first bought from Germany two German cruisers that had taken refuge in a Turkish harbor and added them with their officers and crews to the Turkish navy.

Later, without a declaration of war, she treacherously sent a fleet of Turkish warships under command of German officers and deceptively flying the Russian flag into a Russian port on the Black Sea and bombarded the city and sank a Russian torpedo boat lying at anchor there.

Then she apologized for this unprovoked act of hostility. Russia refused to accept the apology except on condition that Turkey should agree to dismiss the German officers serving in her army and navy, and dismantle, during the war, the two cruisers she had purchased from Germany.

Turkey refused to accede to these terms, and so she is now fighting the allies and Germany is furnishing her the money to do it. One large Turkish army is attacking the Russians near the Armenian frontier and another is attacking the British forces in Egypt, while a French and British fleet are bombarding the Dardanelles forts that guard the gateway to Constantinople.

This action on the part of Turkey will probably drive the other Balkan States, Bulgaria, Roumania and Greece, to enter the war on the side of Russia and her allies. Pretty much of Europe, Asia and Africa is now involved in the war.

Adulteration of Silks

IF the testimony of Adolph Lessig before the U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations as reported in the daily papers of June 16 is true,—and we have seen no denial of it,—we are sadly in need of protection by law against fraudulent adulterations of silks.

Mr. Lessig claimed to have had ten years' experience in a silk mill near Boston. He is reported to have testified "that adulteration is common in the biggest mills. The result was that, charged with iron, lead or other minerals, a pound of inferior silk weighed three pounds and sold as the best. After being made into garments, however, it quickly rotted and fell to pieces."

It is generally known that shoddy and cotton are commonly used to adulterate certain kinds and grades of woolen goods.

Every manufacturer of textile fabrics should be required, under heavy penalty of law, to specify on the label the nature and quantity of any and all adulterants contained in the goods.

The Vera Cruz Puzzle

"HOW to Get out of Vera Cruz?" is a puzzle that President Wilson and Secretary of State Bryan have been trying their best for the last three months to solve; but according to latest reports, although they worked hard over the problem through a three hours' recent session, they can't find the right answer.

We all know how they got in there; how the dispute with former President Huerta over the little flag incident resulted on May 21 in the forcible seizure of the city and harbor of Vera Cruz by U. S. naval forces pursuant to direct orders from President Wilson.

We know that in this action seventeen of our brave sailors and marines were killed and sixty-one were wounded, but how many millions it has cost to transport and maintain the large naval force and the army under General Funston by which we have held possession during the last six months we do not know, although the American people have to pay the bill—and sure enough it is a big one.

But what has it all amounted to? What good has resulted from it either to our own people or to Mexico?

It never brought us any satisfaction from Huerta for the insult to our flag nor for the other outrages and indignities perpetrated by those acting under his authority.

About three months after our seizure of Vera Cruz Huerta was deposed and driven out of Mexico by the successful revolutionists under leadership of Generals Carranza and Villa. Thereupon, in August, General Carranza demanded that the U. S. forces be withdrawn from Vera Cruz, which our government willingly agreed to do, and would have done in September but for the fact that before the President could make the necessary arrangements General Villa and his army revolted and began a civil war for the overthrow of the Carranza government.

Ever since August President Wilson has wanted to get out of Vera Cruz, but finds himself in this dilemma. To whom shall he deliver the city? As Carranza and Villa are at war with each other, to turn it over to either would be a breach of neutrality on the part of the United States; neither will it do for us to merely get out and leave the city a defenseless prey to be fought for and plundered by the warring factions. We have assumed a responsibility that is difficult to resign and costly to maintain, and may even draw us into war with Mexico or some part of Mexico.

Cultivated Lands in the United States

"When you look around you, or when you try to get a piece of land and find the price that is wanted for it," said a young man in a confident tone of voice "you would hardly suppose that only about twenty-seven per cent of the tillable land in this country is actually under cultivation, would you? Well after careful estimates by the Department of Agriculture made from 35,000 reports received from all sections, that's the answer. We have in our country, that is continental United States, one billion, nine hundred million acres, and of this one billion, one hundred and forty million acres, or sixty per cent are tillable. This includes all already under cultivation, or that may be made tillable by clearing, drainage, irrigation, etc. Then there are 361 million acres, or nineteen per cent, which cannot be tilled, but are valuable for grazing and fruit-raising. The amount of land that is worthless for agriculture of any kind is estimated to be 399 million acres. By the last census returns there were 311 million acres in crops, which is, say, sixteen per cent of the total land area, or about twenty seven per cent of the tillable area. With something over eight hundred million acres of land not yet under the plough it looks like land ought to be cheap enough for every man to have a farm, but the cost of getting most of this unused land into farm shape, or getting means of crop transportation to it even if a man had the land free, make it fully as expensive as the cultivated land, though at present is practically worth nothing."

Consolidated Schools

"The Little Red Schoolhouse which has been so much praised in this country," said a man who might have been a school teacher, "is becoming played out in many sections where education of the young is receiving education itself in how to do educational work more efficiently. This work is being done by the consolidated school system, that is, instead of having a lot of little schoolhouses, none of them as good as they should be, one really good school building with all the modern appliances of education and with efficient teachers is erected and the pupils attend school there under the most favorable auspices. Many of the pupils live too far away to walk to this building, so they are brought to it in conveyances at the public expense and taken home after school. With all these advantages the cost is no more, if as much, as by the old system of many little schoolhouses, showing the economy of organization and consolidation. At present Ohio and Indiana lead in the new movement, but the other states are getting there. Indiana abandoned 1,600 small schools and now reports 19,000 pupils transported in one thousand vehicles. Kansas has over 6,000 pupils in her consolidated schools and Massachusetts spends $350,000 a year in taking pupils to and from school, while Iowa spends about one-tenth that amount. North Carolina has closed 1,200 little red schoolhouses and takes her school children to the big consolidated buildings. Ohio had her first consolidated school in 1892 and now has over 200, and in 1903, Tennessee passed a law closing over a thousand one-teacher schools. In thirty-one of its thirty-eight counties the state of Washington had 120 consolidated schools two years ago and new ones have since been added. In Delaware county, Indiana, one consolidated school represents ten small schoolhouses and one three-teacher town school and has nine teachers with a full high school course. Thirteen school stages carry 250 children to and from school, every day. Four school districts in Winnebago county, Ill. have a single building costing $17,700, and three districts in Putnam county have a building costing $12,000. As an evidence that the children appreciate the greater advantages furnished and particularly riding to and from school in comfortable vehicles, the attendance has increased 25 per cent and the standard of scholarship has been very considerably elevated. We are not getting to it as fast as we should, but within a few years the consolidated school will have made the little red schoolhouse only a memory, a pleasant one, no doubt, but only a memory."

Making Ends Meet

"If debt is to be avoided, expenses must be kept on the right side of income."—Dr. Geo. C. Lorimer.

Under present conditions, many heads of families are finding it increasingly hard to make ends meet, while as far as making them lap a little, that seems impossible, they say. But that is what must be done if any progress or any provision for the future is to be made.

Every man ought to know that if he has good health but does not get on in the world and accumulate something, he alone is to blame. The opportunity has been before him.

The best helper in any man's life is a good wife. She puts hope into the heart of a man and inspires him to do his best; she assists him to save money and sets the example herself, but she may not know how to save wisely.

Lack of thrift in household buying is generally considered a cause of the high cost of living. The old-time grocer never expected to sell less than a whole ham or a shoulder or a side of bacon, a bushel of cornmeal, a peck to a bushel of beans, a peck of dried apples. A ten-gallon keg of molasses was a common sale, almost never a sale of less than a gallon and when the smaller quantity was purchased buyers always brought their own jugs.

Now people buy 10 cents' worth of corn syrup and must have it in a tin can that costs 3½ cents to make. In place of bringing a jug and getting a gallon of vinegar for 20 to 30 cents, they buy the same sort of vinegar in bottles so it costs them 80 cents to $1 a gallon. They must have their ham and bacon cut in certain sort of slices, regardless of the waste, buyers taking only enough for a single meal, say, 10 to 25 cents' worth.

Another thing, people now buy the hard staples of living in what we may say are infinitesimal quantities. The storeroom in the home is a rare thing. Many families now make separate purchases for every meal; they send or telephone to the grocery a dozen times a day. It costs the grocer almost as much to sell and deliver each 10-cent sale as a $5.00 one.

If the boys and girls in the public schools could be taught the elementary facts in regard to marketing, as well as the importance of saving and depositing in the bank, it would be a great national benefit.

T. D. MacGregor.

More Good Roads

"You wouldn't think, to see as much bad road as anybody can see almost anywhere in this country," said a man with mud on his boots, "that any great amount of money was being spent on their improvement, but the fact is that last year about 206 millions of dollars was spent on public roads in the United States. It looks like we ought to have a whole lot of good roads for that amount of money, and we have, but this is a whaling big country and a little good road doesn't go very far. But more is being added every year for in 1904, only 79 millions were spent, which indicates an increase of over 250 per cent in ten years. One reason of the greater interest in good roads is the aid given by states to counties and local communities. New Jersey started this good work in 1891 with a State Highway law, but at first the other states were slow to follow, only fifteen having such laws by 1904. After that something started them, automobiles, may be, and now every state except six has road departments, and last year the state added $38,755,088 to the local appropriations of various kinds. These appropriations aggregate about 151 million dollars, not counting about 15 million dollars in the form of labor by road-workers in country districts. New York is spending ten millions a year by law on improving its roads and shows a larger increase than any other state. The average cost per mile of the four kinds of roads in use are: Sand-clay, $723; Gravel, $2,947; Macadam, $4,989; Bituminous-macadam, $10,348. When a good sand-clay road can be built for $723 a mile it is a shame that millions of people in the United States use the awful roads they do, year after year."

$25 for Each Child

The parliament of Australia has passed a resolution to the effect that the parents of each child born will now receive $25 as a prize. However, Asiatic residents and black natives are barred from these prizes.

Its First Earnings

From reports just received, the Panama Canal, in the first week of its use, earned about $150,000. This is a good showing as the war in Europe is operating to reduce the traffic through the Canal because it is keeping many ships out of active service.

Sale of Goods by Heliograph

Harley Heath, manager of the grocery department of C. E. Blackwell & Co., of Tonasket, Wash., has initiated a method of selling goods by use of the heliograph. Mr. Heath was formerly in the forest service, and by the use of an automobile headlight called the Anneas Mountain lookout of the United States Forest Service, a distance of fifteen miles. Mr. Heath had no difficulty in getting in communication and after a little chat received an order for groceries.

California Has Arsenic Springs

Arsenic in quantities surpassing the percentage of the only other spring of its kind in the world has been discovered in the waters of the springs at Arrowhead, north of San Bernardino, Cal., by Dr. F. C. S. Sanders at Berkeley, and as a result the resort in the local mountain foothills is expected to become one of the most famous spots in America. According to the analysis made by Curtis & Tompkins of San Francisco, analytical chemists, as a result of Dr. Sanders' discovery, the water at Arrowhead was found to contain one-twentieth of a grain of arsenic to the gallon, while that of the only other known spring in the world at Bourboule, France, contains 1-67 of a grain to the gallon. This latter percentage of arsenic is found in steam caves in Waterman Canyon.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

MERRY CHRISTMAS, dear sisters and how I wish it were possible for me to extend that greeting in person, into the many homes I seem to know through your letters. I cannot understandingly express to you what your letters mean to me. As I read them I get tantalizing glimpses of so many happy homes that I long to know you all personally but since that cannot be, I shall have to content myself with letting COMFORT carry my good wishes to each and everyone of you at this joyous Christmas season when all hearts are filled with the loving Christmas spirit. It is of that much abused Christmas spirit that I wish to speak. It has become but a farce with the average person who regards it merely on a commercial or give-and-take basis, forgetting the beautiful significance of the day and all that it should mean.

Mothers, instead of spending time over a too elaborate dinner, tell your children the story of Christ and all that His coming meant to mankind. The impression received then will have a lasting effect and who knows but that the remembrance of the Christ story as learned at their mother's knee, may be the means of keeping them from temptation later in life!

As to gifts, we are too apt to give with an eye to outward appearances, are we not? If, instead of wearing your nerves to a frazzle and consequently upsetting the harmony of the home, over the making of a pair of embroidered guest towels for Cousin Jane, who has but little time for plain sewing even, you were to present her with neatly hemmed, serviceable towels, do you not think she would appreciate them more? No, possibly she would not appreciate them more for she would recognize the love that prompted the gifts but she would find them much more useful. Use good sound judgment in selecting gifts.

With the "Peace on earth, good will to men" refrain echoing over the land, stop and seriously consider what it means. If there is a slight misunderstanding existing between a once dear friend and yourself, forget your false pride and be friends once more. Be generous with those who have less of this world's goods than yourself, but whether or not you are able to give of material things, bear in mind that genuine love and sympathy are priceless gifts, and to the greatest Giver of Gifts, bring what is most pleasing to Him, "an humble and a contrite heart," and midst your prayers do not forget the homes over the sea that are saddened by this most terrible of all wars.

Again, A Merry Christmas, and to quote Tiny Tim of Dickens' "Christmas Carol," "God bless us every one."—Ed.

Will the sisters kindly send us the names and addresses of any poor, unfortunate, worthy neighbor, friend or acquaintance who would wish to read COMFORT regularly but cannot afford to pay the subscription price? By means of our charity subscription fund we could supply COMFORT free to a number of such unfortunates if we had their names. It comes about in this way. From friends who appreciate and wish to help in extending the good work that COMFORT is doing we frequently receive cash contributions for the purpose of paying for COMFORT subscriptions to be donated in charity to such persons as our publisher may choose. Just now we have a fund on hand for that purpose, and we will distribute subscriptions to the persons whose names the sisters send us, until the fund is used up in this way. Send the names and addresses, with a brief explanation of your own, to Mrs. Wilkinson, care of COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and I will see that they are attended to in due order—first come first served.—Ed.

MOUNTAIN HOME, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you please permit a stranger direct from the Ozark mountains of Arkansas to enter your circle?

I have been a reader of COMFORT for some time and think it grand. I am nineteen years old, but will not describe myself as I am only a plain looking girl, no attractive features at all.

I wonder how many have lived in our state, Arkansas? I presume a great many have and many would like to see the country.

We have been here only two years. There is beautiful scenery and one from the prairies thinks it wonderful but they soon seem to tire of the scenery and pine for their home on the prairie. But so many of us are not satisfied with any place when we should be contented with our lot. As the old adage goes, "A rolling stone gathers no moss" is most true.

We have traveled a great deal, having lived in the states of Kansas, Missouri, and in the northeast part of Oregon, among the Blue mountains. Every country has its faults. I believe in staying where you are reared if possible. I am also for the movement "Back to the farm." And to all who are thinking of leaving the farm, don't be in a hurry to go. The city has many attractions, but think of its vices and sins. Stay on the farm a while longer. Don't be in a hurry to go.

Sometimes I get so lonesome here that everything seems dismal. How many have the same feelings, when they ought not, to? But it seems impossible to avoid them sometimes. I heartily sympathize with all who are lonesome.

"If you are on the wrong line, get a transfer,
Get off the line of doubt and gloom.
Get on the sunshine track, there's room.
Get a transfer."

Here are a few lines which I think would promote happiness, although they seem rather difficult.

"Forget"

"Forget the faults of other people,
Forget your enemies and remember your friends,
Forget all gossip as soon as you hear it.
Forget your own failures and remember your success.
Forget the pin-pricks, slights and trival offences incident to all life,
Forget to do anyone an injury, but remember to do everyone a kindness."

And now girls, how many are of my same age and birthday, the sixth of April? And here I am, still lingering, and I can see you all frowning at me.

I shall be delighted to hear from everyone who cares to write. With best wishes to one and all,

MISS CLEO CHRISTINE COCHRANE.

MENOMINEE, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for years and no one knows how I enjoy the paper; the only thing I do not like is that it does not come oftener. The months seem long when I am anxious to get it.

I will say a word about the farm and the city. I have lived in both, but just now I am living in the city. I think one is just as good as the other. The city is a good home for a family who like it but if one is not satisfied there, they will never make a success of it. We did not like the farm so we moved to the city and are doing fairly well, but I think a very large family will find it easier to make things go on the farm than in the city because on a farm a child from nine years up is a great help whereas a child in the city must be sixteen years old before he can be of any help.

My husband has four boys so you see I am stepmother to them and we get along very well.

I read Mrs. Baker's letter and will say that I hope the children love her; if they do it is very easy to get along and if they do not why all a person has to do is to return good for any slight they may give her. I take as good care of them as if they were my own. I join in their games if they are not rough, and help them out of any difficulty which puzzles them. If they quarrel among themselves I stand by the one in the right and tell which is right and which is wrong. In that way they cannot do wrong, and I think if they are cross a kind word will go a hundred times further than scoldings. I am not a wise person but I will cheerfully give a kind word where I can.

I trust you will admit another sister to your happy circle and that my letter is not too long.

I wish all the sisters God's richest blessings and learn to go to Him in our hour of need and pray to Him for help in all our earthly trials and troubles.

A true COMFORT sister, MRS. G. A. STURDY.

Comfort's Sisters' Recipes and Every-day Helps

DEVILED HAM.—One pint of boiled ham, chopped fine, with a good proportion of fat, one teaspoon of dry mustard, one teaspoon of flour, one half cup boiling water. Press and when cold cut in slices.

BAKED CODFISH CAKES.—Shred finely enough salt codfish to make one and one half cups, cover with cold water and let soak six hours. Put three cups of sliced raw potatoes in a pan, spread the fish over the top, cover with cold water and boil until the potatoes mash together, then add one tablespoon of butter, two beaten eggs, half a cup of milk or cream and a little white pepper. Beat the mixture well together, and when light spread it on a pan, cut it in squares, brush over with beaten egg, sprinkle with crumbs and bake in the oven.

FRENCH FRIED SWEET POTATOES.—Peel raw sweet potatoes, cut in thin strips lengthwise and fry in deep boiling lard until brown. Sprinkle with salt while still hot and serve at once.

STUFFED SWEET POTATOES.—Bake large sweet potatoes and when soft make a slit down one side, scoop out the inside and beat it with salt, pepper, a half cup of cream and a teaspoon of lemon juice. Fill the shells, return to the oven to brown.

SWISS EGGS.—Spread the bottom of a dish with two ounces of butter, cover this with grated cheese. Break eight eggs upon the cheese without breaking the yolks. Season with salt and pepper. Pour a little cream on the surface. Strew about two ounces of grated cheese on the top and set the eggs in a moderate oven for about fifteen minutes. Brown on top.—Ed.

TOMATO NOODLES.—To one half can of tomatoes, add salt, pepper and butter; let boil hard and while boiling, mix in a mixing bowl four eggs beaten real stiff with flour, roll out in cakes let dry, cut, put in to tomatoes while boiling, be sure and have plenty of water on tomatoes before putting noodles in.

SALMON AND EGGS.—One can salmon, three eggs beaten light, three crackers crushed fine; mix all together fine with butter the size of an egg; fold in hot grease and let fry until eggs in salmon are done.

MRS. A. S. GLAZIER, Mt. Carmel, Ill.

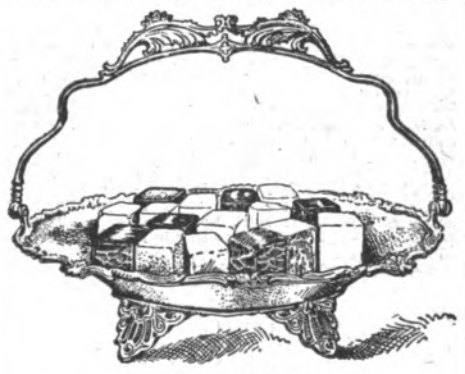
UNCOOKED CHILI SAUCE.—One half peck ripe, solid tomatoes, chopped, one half cup salt, one half cup sugar, two cups celery chopped very fine, two cups finely chopped onions, two small red peppers, also chopped, one cup white mustard seed, one tablespoon each black pepper and ground cinnamon, one quart vinegar. Mix all together. Put in a stone jar and cover with a cloth only. Celery can be omitted.

SANDWICH FILLING.—One cup chopped seeded raisins, one cup walnuts chopped, whip one cup cream, add one tablespoon sugar. Mix all together lightly. Spread between thin cookies or unbuttered crackers.

MRS. I. D. GRAY, Weeser, Idaho.

PREPARED MUSTARD FOR TABLE USE.—Mix four tablespoons of sugar with four tablespoons of mustard and one tablespoon of flour; beat in one egg until perfectly smooth, then stir in one cup of good vinegar, added very slowly to prevent curdling. Cook in a double boiler, stirring constantly. Remove from fire and add one tablespoon of butter.

RHUBARB JAM.—Six pounds rhubarb, five pounds sugar, two lemons, one pound figs or strawberries. Cut rhubarb in small pieces, mix with sugar and let stand over night. In the morning cut figs or berries and lemons in small pieces, add to rhubarb and sugar and cook slowly four hours.



MRS. EVA R. RICHTER, Walkerville, Mich.

CRAB APPLE JELLY AND JAM.—Remove stems and blossoms from the apples; let them scald and pour off the first water; next put them in enough water to cover nicely, and let them cook slowly; as they begin to soften, dip off the juice for jelly, straining it; one pound of juice to a pound of sugar. It needs careful cooking and stirring.

GRAPE JAM.—Separate the skins from the pulp, keeping them in separate dishes, put the pulp in your preserving kettle with a teacup of water; when thoroughly heated, run them through a colander to separate the seeds; then put your skins with them and weigh, to each pound of fruit add three quarters of a pound of sugar, and merely water enough to keep from burning, cook slowly three quarters of an hour. These two jams are delicious and worth the trouble.

MRS. W. L. WOOTERS, Reid Hill, Alta, Can.

SPONGE SQUARES.—Four eggs, one cup sugar, one cup flour, one teaspoon baking powder, one teaspoon vanilla. Beat the eggs thoroughly, beat in the sugar and add flour and baking powder. Bake in hot oven. When cool cut in small squares. Ice these squares with chocolate and white icing.—Ed.

GREEN TOMATO MINCE MEAT.—One peck green tomatoes chopped fine, pour boiling water over, let cool; drain and scald again, let cool and drain and put in preserving kettle with five pounds of brown sugar, two pounds of raisins, one large cup suet, juice of three lemons, four cups of chopped apples, one cup of vinegar, one teaspoon cinnamon, one teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon of allspice. Cook all together until tender for about twenty minutes and seal hot.

MRS. CLARA SCHOPPER, Juaniata, Pa.

GROUND CHERRY BUTTER.—Two gallons ground cherries, one pint of water, one half gallon of well-cooked apples, two lemons sliced, teaspoon of soda and sugar enough to sweten to taste. Cook half hour or until stiff enough to spread well. This is good. Ripe or green cherries can be used.

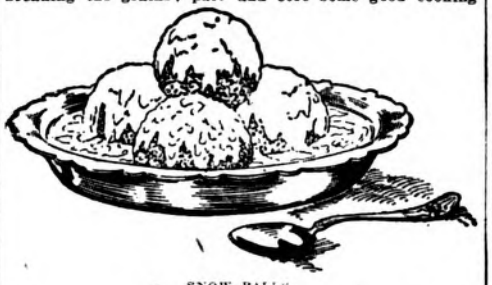
MRS. ESTEL THOMASON, West Graham, Va.

BRAN BREAD RECIPE.—Two cups bran, one cup corn meal, one half cup white flour or whole wheat flour, two and one half teaspoons baking powder, one half cup molasses, one egg, pinch of salt. Beat egg and add one half pint sweet milk. Mix dry ingredients then pour in molasses, add milk and egg and stir quickly. I sometimes add a cup of seedless raisins. Bake in slow oven one and one half hours, if in loaf; if one wants muffins bake in quick oven. The loaf is more satisfactory, it can be sliced and eaten as bread. Always sprinkle greased pan with corn-meal to prevent sticking. This is excellent for constipation.

MRS. L. H. HAGGARD, Norwood, Ohio.

SQUASH ROLLS.—One egg, one large tablespoon sugar, butter size of an egg, one cup sweet milk, one teaspoon soda, two teaspoons cream of tartar, two cups flour. Beat together, add one half cup sifted squash. Drop in roll pan.

CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING.—One cup butter, one cup molasses, two cups of milk, two teaspoons of soda, four eggs, two pounds of raisins (chopped), one pound currants, one half pound citron, salt and all kinds of spices, flour to make a batter thick as pound cake. Steam five hours. Serve with hard sauce, liquid, or cream.—Ed.



LITTLE BROWN PUDDING.—One quarter cup sugar, one quarter cup butter, one quarter cup New Orleans molasses, one half cup sweet milk, one egg, one and one half cups flour, one half teaspoon each of cloves, allspice, cinnamon and soda. Steam one hour in buttered basin or dish. Serve with following sauce.

SAUCE.—Cream one half cup sugar, one quarter cup butter; take one cup boiling water and thicken with one tablespoon corn-starch. When ready to serve add creamed butter and sugar to the warm cream, flavor with one teaspoon vanilla.

MRS. I. D. GRAY, Weiser, Idaho.

SCOTCH COOKIES.—One pound flour, one pound brown sugar, two eggs, one ounce of cinnamon, teaspoon of baking powder, one quarter pound of butter. Roll thin.

SNOWBALLS.—Boil a cup of rice in water without breaking the grains; pare and core some good cooking apples; spread some of the rice on pudding cloths, just large enough to cover an apple; set on apple in the center of the rice carefully, and boil and steam for an hour; when done serve with lemon sauce.—Ed.

NEGRO CAKE.—Three eggs, two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, one cup of milk, one half cup chocolate, two and one half cups of flour, one teaspoon soda, two teaspoons cream of tartar. Bake in two tins.

FILLING.—Two cups of sugar, one cup of cream, one half cup of chocolate, boil until thick enough to spread. —Ed.

DEMONSTRATOR'S CAKE.—One half small cup butter, one cup sugar, cream together; three quarters cup, milk; two eggs. Beat separate, adding whites last thing before baking. Two cups flour sifted four times, two teaspoons baking powder and one teaspoon vanilla.

ICING.—One cup powdered sugar, enough milk to make real stiff dough, add one tablespoon butter melted, one quarter teaspoon vanilla.

This is one of the recipes used to demonstrate electrical stoves and gas ranges, and if directions are followed it never fails.

MRS. IRA D. GRAY, Weeser, Idaho.

OATMEAL MACAROONS.—Two tablespoons of butter, two eggs, one teaspoon baking powder, one cup sugar, one half teaspoon table salt, three cups rolled oats. Bake in hot oven until crisp and brown.

CHOCOLATE FUDGE CAKE.—One cup sugar, two eggs, one and one half cups flour, two squares unsweetened chocolate, one half cup butter, one half cup milk, one half teaspoon baking powder, one half teaspoon vanilla.

MRS. C. E. PARKS, Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

BURNT SUGAR CAKE.—One cup of granulated sugar put in a granite basin and burnt until nearly black, stirring constantly. Then add three quarters cup hot water, one and one half cups of sugar, two thirds cup of butter, two eggs, one cup cold water, two teaspoons baking powder and two cups flour.

MAHOGANY CAKE.—One and one half cups of sugar, one half cup of butter, three cups of flour, one half cup of cocoa, one half cup of sweet milk, three eggs, one and one half teaspoons of soda and one teaspoon of vanilla.

REKA ABELS, Grundy Center, Iowa.

EXCELLENT CAKE.—Two cups light brown sugar, creamed until light with one cup butter; yolks of four eggs beaten with one teaspoon sugar, add to sugar and butter, beat all; add one cup of rich milk, stir well then add one half teaspoon of salt and strawberry flavoring. Sift flour twice, the last time add one and one half teaspoons of baking powder, stir in cake until as thick as any ordinary cake. Then beat hard until creamy; bake. Beat whites of eggs for filling and covering of cake.

MRS. A. S. GLAZIER, Mt. Carmel, Ill.

LEMON CHEESE CAKE.—Two cups granulated sugar, one half cup butter, three quarters cup sweet milk, whites of six eggs, three cups flour, three teaspoons baking powder.

SAUCE OR FILLING FOR LEMON CHEESE CAKE.—Grate rinds and juice of two lemons, add yolks of three eggs, one half cup butter, one cup sugar, mix well together. Cook till thick as sponge. Be careful not to scorch. This is excellent.

MRS. C. W. FREELOVE, Glendale, Arizona.

SPICE CAKE OR VELVET LUNCH CAKE.—One half cup butter, one cup sugar, one cup sour milk, two cups flour, one egg or yolks of two, one teaspoon soda dissolved in the milk, one cooking spoon syrup, one teaspoon each of cinnamon and cloves, one quarter teaspoon allspice. Nuts or fruit added to this makes a good fruit cake.

MRS. ATTA BEACH, Graylin, Colo.

MOLASSES COOKIES.—One cup molasses, one cup brown sugar, two heaping teaspoons soda; one cup each of lard and warm water, one teaspoon each of allspice and ginger. Roll out as soft as possible.

MRS. HARRY KLINE, Kimball, Minn.

PLAIN FONDANT.—Boil without stirring, two and one half cups sugar, one and one quarter cups of water and one quarter teaspoon cream of tartar to the soft ball stage; that is, until when dropped into cold water it forms a soft ball. Remove from fire, let stand until cool, then beat until creamy. Turn out onto a large platter and knead until free from all lumps and soft and smooth in texture. From this may be made many different kinds of candy.

CHOCOLATE CREAMS.—Mould fondant into any shape desired. Let stand in a cool place until firm. Melt plain or confectioner's chocolate over hot water. Lay each cream on a fork, dip into the chocolate and slide onto oiled paper.

TAFFY.—Boil together without stirring, one and one half cups sugar, one quarter cup water, one eighth teaspoon cream of tartar and one quarter teaspoon vinegar to the brittle stage. Pour into buttered plates and when cool enough to handle, pull until white and glassy, adding any desired flavoring. Pull into a long, thin strip and cut immediately with scissors into small pieces. Lay on buttered paper.

BROWN TAFFY.—Boil together one cup brown sugar, one teaspoon butter, one teaspoon molasses, two teaspoons water and one teaspoon vinegar to the brittle stage. Pour into buttered tins and proceed as above.

STUFFED DATES.—Cut dates lengthwise, remove the seed and fill with nuts. Roll in granulated sugar.

CHRYSTALLIZED FRUIT.—Boil two cups of sugar with a cup of water and one quarter teaspoon of cream of tartar. Test it by dropping a little in cold water; when brittle, remove from fire. Dip into it, sections of orange from which all skin is removed, white grapes, cherries or fruit of any kind. Spread on waxed paper to harden.

DELLVALE, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been reading in our corner of quite a number of mothers whose babies have constipation. Our little boy is now eighteen months old and has been constipated more than half of his life, the last six months so badly that his bowels would very seldom move without the use of an enema (suppositories did no good). We consulted a good doctor and this is what he said to do: Feed orange, prune and apple juice, plenty of water (some the first thing after rising in the morning), oatmeal and other cereals and plenty of butter. Then massage the bowels for fifteen minutes each day with olive oil, beginning at the right side low down, moving up and around to starting point. I did not have all the things mentioned and was so busy I neglected to massage the bowels quite so long but I did as near as I could and now he is doing fine. I have been doing this not more than a month. I wish all who have trouble in this way would try it.

We live in Sunny Kansas. Crops are pretty good in our parts this year. This is a healthy climate.

We have two little ones, Ruth, age three and one half years, and Elbert, eighteen months.

Best wishes to all. MRS. CLARENCE GOLDSBY.

WEISER, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been reading COMFORT for the past ten months, as my sister sent it to me for my birthday. Each department of COMFORT is so good I have no particular preference.

I, for one, am in favor of farm life as it has been the means of improving my health, although I am far from being well. Three years last March, my husband and I with our infant daughter, left the city to live on Government land. I was reared on a farm but my husband had but little experience in that line as he is an electrician, and had lived all his life in large cities, so farming is no easy matter for us, although we hire most of our work done and my husband works at his trade. With my dear husband and little Ella Elizabeth, am happy except for my poor health, but we are doing all that can be done for it, practically living in the open air.

One sister asked what to do to correct the habit of thumb sucking. Wrap the thumb with adhesive plaster one inch wide. The habit is very dangerous, as it elongates the upper jaw and at about the age of three years you will notice the upper teeth will extend about one quarter to one half inch in front of the lower ones. There is no way to correct it until they lose the teeth and the new set should be shaped in place by a competent dentist. But adenoids will cause the lower jaw to recede, so don't mistake one for the other. I am enclosing three of my choice recipes and if Mrs. Wilkinson doesn't tire of this, will try and give some helpful information later. Before leaving I wish to ask if any know either song: "The Little Brown Church in the Vale," and "Baby's Left the Cradle." My mother used to sing them, and I would like the words.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, and to Uncle Charlie, I am, ever a sister.

MRS. IRA D. GRAY.

Mrs. Gray.—Your letter will come as an answer to a question that is uppermost in many minds. "What shall I give for Christmas?" Why not a subscription to COMFORT? You certainly cannot get more for the same amount of money and its coming every month will be a reminder of the giver and a renewed source of pleasure to the recipient.—Ed.

PLEASANT VALLEY, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for quite a number of years and certainly enjoy reading it, especially the letters from you sisters. They are cheerful and encouraging and help us to see that other people have even more troubles than we have. Often when I read the letters I wish I could see and speak to the sisters that write them.

Mrs. DeMonburn, your letter was certainly inspiring.

Mrs. Conrod, I can sympathize with you. I have lived in the country almost all my life. Last year I was in the city for three months and how I did long for the country. Man made the city and God the country. In the country we are brought closer to God. While in the city I was taken sick and had to go back in the country to my parents. I think there is no place like the dear old farm. The following is a verse

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING EVENTS.

Alice and May Weston receive an invitation to a farewell reception, given to William Curtis Marchmont, the adopted son of Roland Fletcher, who is engaged to Alice, and is to enter Yale College. Alice is to study law with Judge Ashburton, whose daughter was the wife of Roland Fletcher. Her health failing their daughter Olive is sent, when a baby, to her grandfather, Judge Ashburton, living then in Philadelphia. Imogen Ingraham's mother, Mrs. Farquahar, marries Judge Ashburton. She dies, and Imogene, as the widow of Robert Ingraham and homeless, is invited by Judge Ashburton to accept a home with him and care for Olive. She conceals the birth of her child.

Roland Fletcher, assisted by Olive and Imogen on his left, Judge Ashburton and Will on his right receive their guests. Imogen and Olive, jealous of the attentions given to Alice, ignore her half-extended hand. Mr. Fletcher mortified and displeased receives her most cordially and welcomes her to Castleview. Later he leads her in a quadrille, after which they go into a long corridor. Stopping before a painting Alice learns it is the portrait of Mr. Fletcher's wife. He wishes nothing better for her, than she may be as happy with his boy, as he was with his wife. Will joins them and Olive passes without a word of greeting. Mr. Fletcher follows Olive and requests that she be more courteous to her guests. Will goes to Yale. Judge Ashburton opens his office in town with Alice as his clerk. May is busy. Olive and Imogen out driving, Olive proposes they call for her grandfather. Imogen orders Buxton to drive to the office. Olive takes the lines, Judge Ashburton insists that Alice, who is suffering from a headache, shall ride home. A newspaper caught in the wind, frightens one of the horses and both spring forward. Olive drops the lines and Alice, with rare presence of mind secures them and controls the horses. Judge Ashburton and the driver take Alice home. He reprimands Imogen and Olive for their indifference and failure to thank Alice and realizes a phase in Imogen's character, hitherto concealed. Mr. Fletcher calls upon Mrs. Weston and Alice and expresses his gratitude.

Will's last vacation comes. Judge Ashburton arranges a little excursion which includes Alice and May Weston. Arriving at their destination, they meet Arthur Stamford, in love with Alice Weston, his father Sir Arthur Stamford, Mr. Tom Radcliffe and his sister, Miss Grace. Tom Radcliffe proposes a visit to the caves. Alice Weston and Grace Radcliffe become separated from the party. Alice stopping to tie her shoe Grace goes on. Alice's candle goes out. She feels a grip on her arm and a gruff voice inquires if she knows a woman by the name of Ingraham who lives at Castleview and requests her to send a letter, which he thrusts into her hands. Arthur Stamford returns to find Alice and asks her to be his wife. She admits her love for and engagement to another. In the meanwhile Sir Arthur evinces unusual interest in Will Marchmont and learns to his astonishment that his middle name is Curtis.

CHAPTER VII.

A VERY THRILLING STORY.

HIS cigar dropped to the ground and lay there unheeded, while the judge, hardly less excited by the man's strange questions and demeanor, deliberately threw his away and bent a curious look upon the pale face beside him.

Again there was an awkward silence.

But at length Sir Arthur turned and looked his companion full in the eye.

"I owe you an apology for being so persistent in my questions," he began, "but I have been impressed, ever since meeting Mr. Marchmont this morning, and I am convinced now that we are on the verge of unraveling what has long been, to me at least, a hopeless mystery. May I trespass still further by asking—do you know anything about young Marchmont's parentage?"

"I am bound to confess that I do not," replied the judge, in tones of repressed excitement.

"Are you willing to tell me how this child happened to become the ward of your son-in-law?"

"Certainly, if it will lead to the proof of his identity. I will tell you—in confidence——"

"Of course I will so regard it," said Sir Arthur, as his companion paused.

"Mr. Fletcher found his charge in the slums of New York City, in America," the judge proceeded, as if he had not been interrupted. "He was selling newspapers—a keen, bright, honest little chap who appealed to him because of a streak of veracity which is very unusual in boys of that class. He was very small for his age, dirty, ragged, barefoot. On questioning him my son found that he really belonged to nobody; but that he lived with—was, in fact, the slave of a disreputable old woman, whose only interest in him was what she could make out of him, either honestly or dishonestly. What chiefly touched Mr. Fletcher and prompted him to rescue this waif of humanity, was the fact that this woman tried to make him steal some article for her every day, on penalty of being 'licked,' as he expressed it, if he did not. Almost invariably the brave little fellow took his 'licking' 'for,' he said, 'it hurt him in here to steal,'" and the judge laid his hand over his heart. "That innate honesty was his salvation, for Mr. Fletcher at once sought the woman and bargained for his freedom. He has never regretted his act, for Will is one of the noblest fellows alive, and bids fair to do honor to the man who befriended him."

"But did not Mr. Fletcher learn anything of his origin?" eagerly questioned Sir Arthur.

"No; nothing at all satisfactory. All that he could extort from the old woman was the fact that her daughter, who had been a waiting maid in some aristocratic family, suddenly returned to her and bringing a baby about which she would say nothing. She had money to support herself and the child, but would not tell whence it came. At last her remittances ceased, though she still cared for the child as long as she lived. When she was dying she gave her mother a certificate of baptism and made her promise to guard it most sacredly until the boy arrived at a suitable age, when she stipulated it should be given to him. The name inscribed upon this certificate is William Curtis Marchmont, and also bears the name of a clergyman—Cyrus Hamlin."

"Great heavens! Judge Ashburton, your story solves one of the most wonderful mysteries the world has ever known!" Sir Arthur Stamford burst forth in great excitement as the judge concluded.

Judge Ashburton himself was scarcely less excited.

"Don't keep me in suspense!" he exclaimed, "how can you know anything about this boy's history?"

"How? Because—his mother was my second wife," replied the baronet, in a tremulous tone.

His companion now sat erect and regarded him with undisguised amazement.

"That cannot be possible!" he said, with paling lips.

"I will soon convince you that it is an incontrovertible fact," said Sir Arthur, wiping the moisture from his brow, for his recent agitation told upon his strength.

"Then go on—pray, go on," pleaded his companion, with an impatience that was wholly foreign to his usually calm, dispassionate temperament.

"Well, then," began the baronet, "my second wife's maiden name was Mabel Randal Curtis and her father was a wealthy railroad magnate of New York City. The family lived in affluence on one of the finest avenues of the city and, of course, Mr. Curtis entertained very high-toned views regarding his only child's future. But, as often happens, fate took the matter into her own hands and Miss Mabel fell madly in love with a young English subaltern, whom she met, one summer, at Newport. This young man, William Marchmont, was the nephew of one of England's peers; but, being the son of a second son, he was, of course, regarded as a nobody at that time. Mr. Curtis, upon learning of his daughter's penchant, became very much enraged, although the young man was both morally and intellectually worthy to become the husband of the New York heiress. He cut short their season at Newport, and, after an extensive tour through the Canadas, returned to New York for the winter. But Cupid is a very persistent little god, as we all know, and during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, who were called to Washington for a few weeks, young Marchmont suddenly appeared upon the scene. The lovers gave themselves up to the joy of being reunited, but in the midst of this the young man was suddenly recalled to his regiment, which had been ordered to India. There was a clandestine marriage—a few days of tempered joy before the vessel sailed, then an agonized, though by no means hopeless, parting. But the young husband was shot in his first battle. He lived just long enough to give his wife's address to a comrade; bidding him write and break the news of his fate to her, and then expired. This was only about five months after their marriage. The blow nearly killed the young wife, but a worse trial awaited her, for her husband had thoughtlessly taken the only proof of their marriage with him and she had no means of proving herself a legal wife, even if she had possessed the courage to confess the fact to her father. But she knew that she would soon become a mother and something must be done to shield her good name and the displeasure of her parents."

"Poor child! what a fate for a young woman in her position!" murmured the judge, in a sympathetic tone, as his companion paused an instant.

"As good fortune decreed, however, the Hon. Mr. Curtis decided, just about that time, to treat himself and family to a trip abroad with the intention of remaining a year or two," Sir Arthur continued. "This proved to be his daughter's opportunity and salvation. She refused to accompany them. She claimed that she was afraid to cross the ocean—she did not feel able to travel, and as she had not seemed well for some time, her parents finally consented to allow her, with her maid, to go into the country to board at a quiet place, where they had been many times when they wished to get away from the whirl of city life, and with the understanding that she would join them abroad when she became stronger, Mr. and Mrs. Curtis departed, leaving Miss Curtis to dismiss the servants and close the house before her departure for the country. She dismissed the servants and closed the house, all but a few rooms in the rear where, instead of going into the country with her maid, the two settled quietly down and lived by themselves, never going out except at night, or under the utmost secrecy, and no one knew that they were in the city. There Mrs. Marchmont's child was born, and there she continued to live for more than a year, when her mother was taken suddenly ill, and Mr. Curtis cabled to his daughter to come to them immediately. Of course, during this time, she had arranged to have all letters and messages remailed to her from the office in the country. This was a message she dare not disobey, although her heart was nearly broken over the thought of being separated from her child. She deposited a generous sum in a New York bank, settled the maid and her little one in some comfortable rooms, and then left for Berlin to join her parents. She also confided to the care of her maid the baptismal certificate of her child and charged her that if anything happened to her she was to go to Mr. Curtis on his return, confess everything to him, and beg him to rear and educate the boy; but the girl was sworn to absolute secrecy under all other circumstances. In spite of her physician's decree that she could not live, Mrs. Curtis rallied and continued very comfortable for nearly a year longer, finally passing away at Cannes. Mr. Curtis and his daughter returned to America immediately after this event, and Mrs. Marchmont's first thought after landing was, of course, for her child. She sought her maid in the simple home she had arranged for her, but the girl was not there, and she could obtain no intelligence regarding her. She went to the bank where she had deposited money for her; but was told that she had drawn out the full amount that had been placed to her credit. Impossible, Mrs. Marchmont insisted, for she had remitted a large sum on a certain date from Europe to be placed to her account. It was never received, they told her, and the poor young mother was rendered nearly frantic in view of her unexpected bereavement."

"I can well imagine she might be," Judge Ashburton sympathetically remarked.

"She sought for the missing ones for months, but without gaining any clew to their whereabouts, and she finally came to the conclusion that both must have been stricken with some disease and died; for she believed that the maid must have seen and responded to some of the numerous advertisements which she inserted in various papers, if she had been living. But, during all this season of anxiety she was, of course, obliged to conceal her feelings from her father. He realized that she had long been unlike herself, but attributed the change to her grief for her mother and the new responsibilities that devolved upon her because of her loss. For two years she made a recluse of herself, and then Mr. Curtis insisted that they should resume their proper position in society. She pleaded that she had no heart for the old life of gayety, but he was firm; and they began by opening their house in Newport, where they entertained throughout the summer as they had been wont to do in former years. On their return to New York, in the winter, they reappeared among their friends there, and a brilliant season followed. It was during this season that I met Mrs. Marchmont—or Miss Curtis, as she was known to the world—for the first time. I had lost my wife some two years previous, and had been for some months traveling in America—leaving my son, Arthur, with his grandparents. I was introduced to Miss Curtis at a reception given by one of the Vanderbilts, and was at once charmed with her. To me she seemed a rarely beautiful woman. There was a sweet sincerity about her which one does not often see in society women; an honesty of opinion and a directness of speech that strongly appealed to me, and I sought her constantly after making her acquaintance. Mr. Curtis appeared to be pleased by my preference for his accomplished daughter, and when I sought the privilege of addressing her with the purpose of winning her hand in marriage, he gave me his hearty consent. I had already become quite sure that Miss Curtis herself was favorably disposed toward me; we were congenial in many ways, and now, and then, I thought I detected a vein of tenderness in her manner when we were together. You, can, perhaps, imagine my astonishment and dismay when, upon asking her to be my wife, she kindly but firmly refused me. But I had no intention of abiding by that refusal, for I loved her with the strong and abiding affection of the mature man. I pleaded my cause with all the eloquence of which I was master; but it was all of no avail, until something prompted me to ask her this question. 'Is it because you do not love me well enough to be my wife, Mabel, because you feel that you could not be happy with me? If you tell me that, I will not press you further—I will at once go back to England and try to bear my disappointment with what fortitude I can command.'

"To my amazement she burst into tears and wept as I have seldom seen a woman weep. I waited until the storm had spent itself, and then, with dawning hope, I pleaded again:

"'Must I go, Mabel?'

"With wonderful self-command, she sat erect and faced me, her clear, sad eyes meeting mine with a pure and steady look.

"'I cannot tell you to go, Sir Arthur,' she began, 'until I confide to you that which will throw upon you the responsibility of deciding this question—deciding whether I am worthy to be your wife. I had thought that I should never marry, that my life would be spent with my father, as long as he shall live, and, after that, alone—as far as any domestic ties are concerned.'

"She then related to me in full detail all that I have told you, and, of course, my heart went out to her with even greater tenderness and deepest sympathy, upon learning what she had suffered, and still must suffer, in view of the uncertainty of her child's fate. It was all told simply and without any attempt to excuse or palliate her fault—if marrying the man she loved could be thus regarded, and when she concluded she sat with downcast eyes and quivering lips awaiting my verdict.

"'I simply said, 'I cannot go, even now, Mabel, unless you tell me you do not love me well enough to be my wife. My love for you is only intensified by what you have told me.'

"She did not tell me to go; she owned to an affection deeper and stronger than that of her first love, and, three months from that time, she was my dear and honored wife, and no one save we two was any the wiser regarding the secret of her previous marriage.

"We made many efforts to find her little one before we left the United States, but failed, utterly, to obtain the slightest clew, and finally came home to England, resolved to make the most of our happiness in each other. But a most remarkable thing happened after we had been married some fourteen years. We were visiting in Surrey—it was a hunting party, and our host, the Earl of Belmont, had a house full of visitors. Among them was Lady Marchmont—the Marquise of Leith——"

"What!" suddenly interposed Judge Ashburton, a shock like that from an electric battery pervading him.

"You will remember," said Sir Arthur, "that when I began my story I told you that this William Marchmont, whom Miss Curtis clandestinely married, was the son of a second son, and the nephew of an English peer."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, that peer was Lord Clement Marchmont, Marquis of Leith. He died in 18—. His wife didn't survive him three months; and, leaving no children, the second son, John Marchmont, succeeded to the title and estates. He lived to enjoy his inheritance just five years, then joined the silent majority, leaving his widow to reign as mistress of Marchmont Court. This woman, the present marquise, still survives and lives there alone, having no children. During our visit, of which I have spoken, to the Earl of Belmont, my wife became quite friendly with her, attracted by the name and a vague hope that her ladyship might be a relative of her first husband. During a confidential chat one afternoon, the marquise told Lady Stamford something of her history, and in so doing revealed the fact that she was the mother of William Marchmont, whom Mabel had married and who had been shot in India. She also confided to her that when her son's effects were sent home to her, she found, pinned between the leaves of his Bible, a certificate of marriage, showing that he had married an American girl during his visit to the United States. You can but faintly imagine the sensation this revelation produced, and which resulted in further mutual confessions and a clearing of the whole story. Lady Marchmont at once took Mabel to her heart, but was bitterly disappointed on learning that there had been a son and the story of his mysterious disappearance. She invited us to Marchmont Court, where we had a most charming visit, and when we returned to our home Lady Stamford bore with her the certificate proving her marriage to William Marchmont, who, if he were living, would today be the Marquis of Leith."

"By all that is remarkable! this is the strangest story I ever heard in real life," Judge Ashburton exclaimed, excitedly at this point. "Is Lady Marchmont still living?"

"She is, and a beautiful old lady she is, too—hale and hearty, and beloved by all who know her; while I am sure that, after what I have told you, I do not need to inform you that she is the grandmother of this young man whom your son-in-law, Mr. Fletcher, has reared and educated."

"Yes—I can understand that," returned the judge, in a tone of great satisfaction, "and also that he is today the only heir to Marchmont Court and the title of his father—he is Lord William Marchmont, Marquis of Leith."

"I am sure there cannot be the slightest doubt about the matter," his companion observed.

"But," continued the judge, with sudden thought, "it seems strange to me that the comrade, who was commissioned to notify the young wife of William Marchmonth's death, should not also have made his family acquainted with the fact of the marriage and given them Mrs. Marchmont's address. Such a measure must have resulted in the proof of her marriage."

"Yes, and that matter was fully discussed with the present marquise, during one of our visits to her, when we learned that the comrade also lost his life in the very next engagement. Lady Stamford had faithfully preserved his letter to her, and, of course, that was additional proof of her marriage," Sir Arthur explained.

Everyone in the room could trace a strong resemblance in his own face to the one looking down from the canvas upon him

He led her to a great easy chair.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ORIGIN OF THE WILL.

"Great Scott! it does not seem possible!" continued Judge Ashburton, who seldom allowed himself to lapse into slang even in a mild form; but his excitement may be excused in view of the startling facts he had learned. "Our Will a titled gentleman!—a peer of England! I can scarcely credit my senses, and yet I have always contended that there was good blood in him, for he has ever been innately refined and noble. But will it be possible to establish his identity?" he concluded, turning to Sir Arthur, a shadow of anxiety, flitting across his face.

"Certainly, if that certificate of baptism has been preserved," the baronet responded, confidently.

"It has been most sacredly preserved," the judge assured him. "I am very glad, very, very thankful, to know that this long lost son will at last come into his rightful inheritance," Sir Arthur observed, but in a tone that was somewhat husky. "Lady Stamford grieved for a long time after learning the truth. 'Oh!' she would often exclaim, 'why cannot I find my boy? What cruel fate has decreed that this mystery must enshroud his life?' We advertised again extensively in American papers, seeking tidings of him and the maid, to whose care he had been committed, but we did not have a single reply."

"How long ago was this—when were those advertisements inserted in the papers?" the judge inquired.

"Immediately after learning Lady Marchmont's story—some eight years ago."

"Ah! that was about the time we came to England to reside, or some of us must have seen those advertisements. How strange is life—at what cross-purposes we seem to live," sighed the judge. Then he added: "But the discovery of today will be glorious news for Lady Stamford."

Sir Arthur lifted a quick, pained glance to his companion. "Lady Stamford was taken from me more than five years ago," he remarked, in an unsteady voice.

"Forgive me, Sir Arthur, for recalling a grief like that," said Judge Ashburton, in a tone of deep regret, and with an awkward sense of embarrassment.

"Of course it was but natural for you to refer to Lady Stamford in that way, as I had given you no reason to believe that she was not living," the baronet returned. "But it does seem as if the world and life are all wrong, as you have said, when a revelation like this of today occurs too late to bestow happiness upon those most deeply interested."

"It is a subject that is puzzling many of the deep thinkers of this age," was the thoughtful reply; "the problem of this mortal life has always been an unfathomable one. But I cannot think of anything just now but this wonderful story about our Will. Do you imagine that the Marquise of Leith will be easily convinced of and willing to acknowledge the relationship?"

"I have not the slightest doubt in the world regarding that matter," Sir Arthur confidently asserted. "She became very fond of Lady Stamford, and has never ceased to grieve over the mysterious disappearance of her child and the fact that there is no heir to perpetuate the family name and title. I firmly believe that if Mr. Fletcher can produce the baptismal certificate and give the name of the maid who took him to the slums and left him with the old woman, her ladyship will receive him with open arms and immediately acknowledge him as the rightful heir of Leith. By the way, do you know the name of that girl," he concluded, turning sharply upon his companion.

"I did know at the time," said the man, reflectively, "but I do not recall it at this moment. I am inclined to think that her first name was Maggie, but Mr. Fletcher can tell you."

Sir Arthur nodded his head with an air of satisfaction. "There isn't much doubt," he said; "I know the name, but I shall wait for Mr. Fletcher's proofs."

"Well, I certainly feel as if I had been asleep and dreaming a wild, romantic tale, and was liable to suddenly wake and find it all a myth of the imagination," Judge Ashburton observed, after a few moments of silence, and glancing eagerly towards the woods, for he had caught the sound of voices and knew that the young people were returning.

Presently they came in sight, and a gleam of pleasure shot into the old gentleman's eyes as they fell upon the stalwart figure and fine face of Will, who was a young man of whom he might well feel proud.

"I am sure it will prove to be no 'myth of the imagination' to Mr. Fletcher's protege," said Sir Arthur, whose glance had followed his, "and judging from what I have seen of him today, he will do honor to the brilliant position awaiting him. I was instantly impressed the moment he told me that his name was William Marchmont, that he would prove to be the heir to Leith. But," he added, rising, "it is getting on pretty well towards sundown, suppose we make a start for home, and"—lowering his voice—"don't you think it might be as well to communicate with Mr. Fletcher before saying anything to the young man about this revelation?"

"Yes, I am sure it will be best to communicate with my son first," said the judge. "I will telegraph him this evening, and I believe he will leave everything and return at once, when we will come to you and talk more of this."

Thus the matter was left, and, half an hour later, the party were on the way home, all expressing themselves as having passed a most delightful day.

Arthur Stamford alone carried a heavy heart home, although he tried bravely to conceal all evidences of the crushing blow which he had received; but it seemed to him as if the sun had been suddenly blotted out and that an empty and dreary future lay before him.

Judge Ashburton kept his word, and immediately upon reaching home sent the following telegram to his son-in-law: "Wonderful and important revelation regarding Will. Can you return immediately?"

The following morning brought this reply: "I will be with you on the twenty-third."

The twenty-third would be only three days later, but it seemed to Judge Ashburton as if he never could wait that long before revealing his secret.

WELL, here is the month of Christmas once more, and the ending of another year, one of the most memorable years in the world's history, if not the most memorable. The year which has seen our so-called Christianity and the squalid civilization we have attempted to build upon it, shattered to dust. I've been not a little amused at the astonishment of some good, but very dull and unimaginative people that war on such a tremendous scale could be possible in these "enlightened days." It is extraordinary how people are deceived by outside appearances. Because we have airships, wireless, motor cars, beautiful cities, fine churches and porcelain bath tubs, etc., we jump to the conclusion that the world of today is on the whole civilized. It's only in the externals and the material things of life that the world is changed to any great extent from what it was two thousand years ago. "Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar." Put the much heralded German culture to the test and you find blazing churches, devastated homes and mutilated bodies and wholesale vandalism. Jump on a Frenchman and you are in the embrace of a wild cat. Arouse the Britisher and you are mauled by the fangs of a lion. Disturb an American and—well Colorado and Ludlow will give you the answer. And so it goes nearly all the world over. I had a minister whom I was trying to convert to Christianity to see me the other day (and by the way there are no people on earth that need converting to Christianity more than the individuals who hold down the pulpits in our churches) and he told me he didn't think that human nature had changed much in the last two thousand years, and that men were pretty much today what they always were, and he didn't think that the much longed-for race of supermen (that is nobler and superior men that will some day inhabit the earth) would ever arrive. Note what little faith and less vision he had. When I got through with that minister I had nearly made him a useful citizen. I'd like to tell you all I told him, and he'd give worlds if I could tell you, but though the constitution is supposed to guarantee free speech, you've got to keep a padlock on your tongue these days or you are liable to wake up and find yourself resembling a cream puff that has been trodden on. You who read your Bibles (and not half of you who read these words know anything about that great old book, and those who do know it have the very faintest idea of making use of its teachings), will recall these words of the Master: "Every one that heareth this teaching of mine and doeth it not, is like a foolish man who buildeth his house upon the sand. * * * * * and it fell, and great was the fall thereof." All the worth-while world knows that Christ was the Master teacher of all the ages. He wanted humanity to build, not upon the sand, but on the impregnable rock, the rock of love and brotherhood, righteousness, justice and peace. This however, humanity has steadfastly refused to do, preferring with blindness and stupidity to build a tawdry structure, outwardly beautiful but inwardly a charnel house, on the sands of greed, hate and all uncharitableness, and has had the audacity to call this structure, not only civilization, but a Christian civilization. Suddenly comes the usual terrible war, and every form of mechanical device that devilish ingenuity and perverted genius can invent is turned loose for the destruction of human life. Young men and old are dragged from their firesides and hurled into the cockpit and are hacked and torn to pieces, their pitiful corpses scattered on the bloody sod like autumn leaves after an equinoctial gale, while wives and mothers are left at home with weeping little ones, to starve. Down with a crash goes your so-called civilization and in a second to the winds flies all your Christianity. And people wonder why! And why should they wonder? There is nothing to wonder about. What you sow that is what you will reap. You cannot sow bayonets and reap corn; you cannot sow militarism and reap fraternity; you cannot scramble madly for trade, markets and dollars and breed love and comradeship. Men have been trying and are still trying to do the impossible. They have been sowing one thing and expecting to reap another. They have been trying to rear a solid structure on a false foundation, and the church, false to its Master, has approved of both the foundation and the structure, of the tree and its bitter fruit. Then when the cataclysm comes, and the earth rocks like a palsied man, people wonder why such things can be. You hear them say that Christianity is on trial and that it has been found wanting, or that it and civilization have collapsed. This is not so. Christianity could not possibly have failed for it has never been tried. Civilization could not collapse for we are not civilized. Humanity has not failed, for humanity in the mass has never had a show. What has broken down is not civilization, but veneered barbarism, a savage industrialism, a cannibalistic commercialism and un-Christian churchianity. Humanity has done wonderfully well, marveloulsy well when we take into consideration the fact that it has been attempting the impossible and has had no solid groundwork to build upon, nothing but the shifting sands of greed, ignorance and all-round exploitation. We talk of war as though it were a hateful thing. We see millions of men locked in a bloody conflict and stand aghast with horror. We say again that war has no right to be in these "enlightened days." We froth at the mouth, call mighty meetings and scream for peace, and this in spite of the fact that we are always at war, that life is one long battle, real peace being a thing that humanity except in spots, has never known.

There are more people killed, wounded, maimed and injured, more homes destroyed and hearts broken on the industrial battlefield than there are on the bloody fields of military combat. On the battlefield man is cannon fodder, in the mine, mill, factory and on the railroad he is dividend fodder (if he is lucky enough to get work) and starvation fodder if he is unemployed. Don't let us be hypocrites, let us look this matter squarely in the face. Wars waged by military powers are comparatively rare but industrial warfare, the struggle for bread, clothes and a roof never ceases. The soldier who dies upon the battlefield is a hero. If we can get his body home he lies in state and is given a public funeral. He who dies on the industrial battlefield goes to his grave unwept, unhonored and unsung. Nobody notes his passing, or grieves over his going, for are there not plenty to take his place? Slaughter a few hundred thousand men to the booming of cannon and the waving of flags and humanity stands aghast, slaughter millions and break their bodies on the wheels of industrialism and nobody thinks or cares a rap. The taking off of our fellow beings either by slow starvation or sudden death, makes no appeal to our sympathies, stirs no righteous wrath. So brushing sophistry and humbug aside the whole matter can be summed up thus. We don't mind about slaughter as long as people are killed in driblets instead of in masses, and go to their graves without making a fuss about it. It is only when men get killed to the blare of trumpets and the beating of drums, thousands in a day that men come to realize that Christianity is breaking down, that real civilization does not exist, and the world is all out of joint.

What must we do to make human life and human rights sacred? What is the remedy for the revolting conditions under which most of us have to exist? We must build our civilization upon the rock of justice, co-operation and brotherhood, and must make these vital principles the universal law. If we plant love and justice, we shall reap love and justice. If we give humanity, civilization and Christianity a chance there will be no greed, no desire to exploit and no blood lust in the hearts of men. If you dress children in white and wash and primp them until their faces shine like the morn, they will be as black as the ace of spades in five minutes if you send them to play in a coal cellar. Put them in the parlor clean and they will stay clean. It is the same with humanity which gets spruced up on Sunday only to be thrown into the ash barrel of greed, to come out at the end of the week vile, filthy and evil. What man needs is an environment that will bring out the best that is in him, instead of as at present, an environment which develops all that is worst. We do not have to look to Europe to see that churchianity is a fizzle and civilization a farce. Look around you in this glorious land that is waiting to sing a song of joy and happiness, a song of brotherhood and love, to ten times the people who occupy it now, and you will see tens of thousands of men denied the privilege of making a living. Grown men on the sidewalk, women and little children in the mills. Prisons, poison shops and white slave dens, riotous luxury cheek by jowl with the most appalling poverty; culture and learning side by side with ignorance and superstition, a hodge podge of violent contrasts; disgusting and horrible, those who sow reaping little, those who sow not, garnering all.

And why is this? Once more let the Christ whose birth we celebrate this month, the Christ who is yet to lead dehumanized humanity back to humanity, the lost sheep back to the fold, free His church from commercialized pollution and attune the voice of the weary of earth to the music of the spheres. The explanation is summed up in these words of the Master: "A man built his house upon the sands; and great was the fall of it."

Do not despair my brothers and sisters because we have erected our "civilization" on the sands—for we can move to a sure, certain foundation as soon as we quit fighting each other and go to helping each other. This war will be worth every cent it has cost, and every drop of blood that has been spilled, if it only brings home this tremendous truth to mankind and that is that our ways have been hog ways and not God's ways. Our civilization has been built on the sands, and we must right about face out of the muck and mire in which we have been wallowing, and get upon that solid rock where kings and exploitation shall be a thing of the past and love alone shall rule in the hearts of men.

Now let me ask you something. How many of you ever heard of Nietzsche? Not more than a score of you possibly are familiar with his name, and yet if it had not been for Nietzsche and babies (poor innocent little babies) the frightful war in Europe might have been averted. You've got to know about Nietzsche, a German professor, for he is the idol and god of the military caste of Prussia. Nietzche's abominable philosophy of force, a doctrine anti-social and anti-Christian, a doctrine that teaches men that only might is right, gentleness, humility, compassion, tenderness and sympathy, signs of weakness and decadence, has naturally made an irresistible appeal to a military caste committed to the worship of blood the rule of iron. It is the doctrine that inspired the blasphemous Kaiser to address his soldiers thus: "On me, on me, as the German Emperor, the spirit of God has descended. I am His weapon. His sword and His vice-regent. Woe to the disobedient. Death to cowards and unbelievers." Not since the days of Mohammed have such words found public utterance. The Kaiser's god is the god of battles—Nietzsche's god—a brutal deity of lightning and thunder bolts, cannon and sword, a cathedral smasher, church burner, a plunderer and a pillager. Nietzsche died insane, and those who worship at his shrine (and millions are being influenced by his teachings) quickly develop signs of mental derangement. Nietzsche was an atheist. He scoffed at the Christian virtues, scorned Christian faith and morals, and incited the strong, the "overman" to trample underfoot the weak and humble in spirit. Now you can the better understand why the Kaiser crushed poor little Belgium; now you can understand too, those two crazy tooth-brushes that stick up at each end of his mouth; now you can understand the diet of blood and iron that he is determined to force upon the world; now you can understand why his armies have gone into battle shouting "Duetschland Ueber Alles," (Germany over all). Germany over all by the way means the Kaiser, the goose step, the brutal Prussian military maniacs, the spiked helmet, the iron heel, the mailed fist, crushing heavily on every nation on earth, ourselves included. The German people are just as much under the heel of this military caste, just as much the victims of this Nitzschean philosophy as you are or I am. Nietzschism is militarism in full and bloody irruption. It is the influence of this wicked doctrine that has made the Prussian officers assume the airs of demi-gods as they parade the streets of their native cities, sweeping civilians and their wives into the gutters as though they were dogs. The Zabern incident illustrates my contention to a dot. The doctrine of force is as old as the hills. Christianity has held it in check, but Nietzsche has revived it, and you who have seen the way force has been used in this country, the force of gold and privilege and at times the force of gun and bayonet can gather from these sinister exhibitions that Nietzsche has his followers here as well as abroad. Next month I will tell you how the babies have innocently helped to plunge Europe into bloodshed. For the present I must be content with telling you of this new, old force which is working such devastation in the world. Men must choose between the Prince of right and the Devil of might, between brutality and ideality, between force and love, Galilee and Berlin, Nietzsche and Christ. And surely there is no better time than now to make the choice, when the God of Love and not the god of war is calling a battle-scarred, weary earth, to heed again the divine message pregnant with promise of golden days yet to come: "Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men," and to turn again to the cradle of the Divine Messenger, the Prince of Peace through Whom we shall yet secure both heaven here as well as beyond.

Before bidding you adieu for this year I want to thank from the bottom of a very grateful heart, all those who wrote me on the occasion of my birthday and especially those who wrote in answer to my request in the August issue for suggestions and criticisms of my methods of conducting this department. I was just tickled to bits to find by the hundreds of enthusiastic letters that came to me as a result of that request that you are all with me heart and soul and to the last ditch, in my work of putting the masses wise to the thousand and one wrongs and abuses and the many evil conditions, which have grown like festering sores on the body social and politic, deep-seated wrongs which the people regard as inevitable, but which must be torn up by the roots if our nation is to survive and democracy be given a new birth. I always knew you were with me, but I wanted you to tell me all over again that you were, and your roar of endorsement which came like a thunder clap has rejoiced my heart. God bless you! Of course everyone knows what the people want, what they need and what they ought to have, but privilege and greed muzzle our law makers, who are glad to wear the muzzles—at a price. If the public ever woke up, exploitation would cease, robbery would end and the people would come into their own. But very few will be allowed to indulge in the luxury of waking up because there is more money to be made out of dull than wide-awake people, as the former are more easily fooled, for the world is still committed to the crazy doctrine that it is more profitable to fool the people than to be honest with them. Now that I know you are going to hold up my hands, I shall endeavor with more vigor to assault those hoary wrongs which keep most of us at the grindstone of want and on the rack of hardship, care and worry 365 days a year. The letters sent not only heartened me, but many of them touched me so deeply with their love and tender sympathy that I was all choked up with emotion as I read them. It only shows how the great heart of humanity will go out like a flood to anyone who just tries to do his duty and who strives to be—well—nothing more than just human.

Many people have written to know if there is anything they could do to make life a little brighter for me. The only thing I can suggest, as none of you are Rockefellers, is to see that one of the Uncle Charlie books goes into every COMFORT home. This will help not only to keep my memory alive in your homes in after years, when you have some other uncle to take my place in your hearts, but will also brighten and make happy your Christmas as well as mine. Send me all the loving thoughts you can on Christmas Day, for I feel closer to you at that time than any day in the year, and though I can only look on while others feast, I can feast with you in spirit, and I will drink the health of everyone of you at one o'clock, in a glass of boiled milk, and I will pray God to give you happiness for that day at least, and to grant that in spite of increasing bodily infirmities I may be spared to be with you not only for another year, but for many years.

Christmas is almost here, and as you all want to give presents that will make everybody happy, don't forget that Uncle Charlie's two wonderful books, one of poems and the other of songs, a source of endless joy and merriment which should be in every home, can still be had free; the poems for a club of four, the songs for only two subscriptions. See full particulars at end of this department. Don't miss it. These are the books that will make your Christmas joyous.

Also Uncle Charlie's Story Book can still be had as a free premium in paper covers for a club of two subscriptions, or bound in ribbed silk stiff covers for four subscriptions. Beautiful new edition recently brought out and in either binding would make a most acceptable Christmas gift.

Now for the letters.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I feel so sorry for you but yet indeed too I feel proud. I have written to you before, but as you say, you get so many thousands of letters each month and I know but few of these can ever get into print. This makes my third attempt to write to you.

Oh, say, dear Uncle, what do you say about young boys and girls kissing each other good night when the boys take the girls home. In one way I consider it an improper thing to do and again I don't. Uncle Charlie, you please excuse all the mistakes and poor writing and incorrect spelling. I have only gone to school six years.

Oh, Uncle Charlie, please pardon me but I would like to have you write on the white slave traffic. I am a girl that delights in knowing the facts and true conditions of things for I am trying to keep myself informed on all matters of importance. I love COMFORT and most of all enjoy the cousins' letters and good Uncle Charlie's most laughable and screaming answers.

Just one more question dear uncle. What does a boy mean when he likes to hold a girl's hands, and also when the girl likes to hold his hands too? I hope to see this letter in print.

PINK ROSE.

P. S.—Please dear Uncle if this letter is published do not publish any of my name or address.

Rose, as to the kissing business between boys and girls, let me say this to you girls. I don't mean kids, but girls who are making headway into their teens. When you start in the wholesale kissing business, you are holding yourselves mighty cheap, and that is the worst thing a girl can possibly do. A girl's greatest protection is the armor of modesty that she rears about herself. Young people are full of animal spirits, both boys and girls, but there is a vast amount of difference between the sexes, and whereas nine girls out of ten are pure-minded, the majority of boys are just the reverse. Indiscriminate kissing is the first step on the downward path for any girl. Most girls hold themselves too cheap, and young men with the eyes of hawks are ever watching the slightest lapse on a girl's part, the slightest rent in the armor of her modesty, to rush in and overthrow the citadel of her virtue. It is the boast of some boys that they have kissed every girl in the community. Later on when the girls get married, some of these boys who have graduated into the loafer's class, stand on the street corner and point contemptuously at a young married woman as she passes by and brag of the many times they have slobbered her lips. Young men soon learn which girl can be kissed and which girl cannot be kissed, and they all make a dead set at a kissable girl. If young men were content to stop at kissing there would not be so much danger in it, but the fellow who has the freedom of a girl's lips in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is not going to stop there. If you give him an inch, at some time when the opportunity presents itself, he will take a yard. It's easier to be safe than to be sorry. If you keep out of temptation there will be no sorrows and no regrets. Most girls overrate their powers of resistance, but it isn't wise to allow these powers to be put to the test for too often, when they are tested they break down utterly. It is a queer thing in human nature that young men will shoot to kill to avenge the honor of their own sisters, but they have no respect for the honor of other boys' sisters. There are boys who are as clean minded, honorable and decent as any girl, but you do not find this class of boy pestering a girl for kisses. He prefers to wait until such time as those kisses are legitimately his by virtue of the engagement ring which his financee wears upon her finger. When a young man really idolizes a girl he will treat her with the utmost deference and respect. He knows that one false move might bring about the shattering of all his hopes. The girl who is won too easily is usually not worth winning at all. It is the fish that gives us a terrible struggle to land that we most prize, not the fool thing that comes and jumps on the hook, and signals to be hauled in.

JOHN M. SMYTH MDSE CO., 150-151 W. Madison St., Chicago

The man who is worth while doesn't care to marry a girl who has passed her face around for every fellow in the village to nibble and chew at. You can take it for granted that when a girl allows herself to be kissed the first time she meets a fellow, that she is going to be insulted at the second or third meeting. If you girls only knew what was in the minds of most of your escorts, it would be a hand shake good night for them and nothing else. Let me tell you this little story about a girl I knew. An admirer of hers took her to dinner one night in one of New York's swell lobster palaces. She saw the dinner check which amounted to a little over five dollars. When he took her home and was bidding her good night he wanted to kiss her: "Oh," said my friend, "so you want pay for my dinner do you?" and she opened her pocketbook and took out two dollars and a half and said: "When I have to pay for my meals I prefer to pay for them with cash." Mr. Swift Guy was quite overcome and after apologizing vanished into the night. If you girls can't get home at night without giving your escort pay for his trouble, take my advice and stay at home. You will find it pays in the long run, and the short run, too. You ask me, Rose, what a boy and girl mean when they like to hold each other's hands. It means that they are just beginning to feel foolish and need careful watching by their parents to see they don't make idiots of themselves. It is quite true there is nothing half so sweet in life as love's young dream, and also nothing quite so dangerous, and certainly nothing quite so foolish. Sex attraction makes these affairs inevitable. They are a part of the afflictions of childhood and youth, just as are measles. If they are watched and proper attention is given to the sufferers while the attack is on, both boy and girl will recover without any damage being done to either. Some day, when we get civilized and all have to go to school until we are twenty or twenty-one, a part of our training will be in the school of chivalry. Here the mysteries of sex will be explained, and the appeal of sex will be guided into proper channels. Here girls will learn what men really are, and not what they think they are. Here girls will learn with horror that half of the men who were worshiped as heroes by the girls of a previous generation were diseased libertines and scarce a one would escort a girl three blocks in the dark without exacting some sort of payment for the service rendered. Love, like Christianity, has not had much of a show in this world. The merciless system we live under takes no heed of any man. It gives him a salary on which he cannot support a chicken, let alone a wife, and so he is forced to remain single and become a menace to the womanhood of the land. In the future we shall learn the lesson of self control, and terrible indeed will be the punishment meted out to those who fail to respect the chastity of the gentler sex. I have no space to discuss the white slave trade just now, but will say this: If you girls refrain from indiscriminate kissing and the mauling that generally accompanies it, and keep the armor of your self-respect unbroken and untarnished, the white slave trade will get the biggest smack in the eye it has ever received yet.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A TRAGEDY OF LOVE.

"DECIMA!" screamed Polly when, with the merest apology for a knock, Nina entered the familiar rooms in Percy Street, the room in which she had found loving shelter in her time of need, the room in which she had trimmed hats and bonnets, and afterward—oh, great achievement—written plays for the members of Mr. Harcourt's company! "Decima!" and Polly, with the tears in her eyes, hugged her dear friend, never dearer than in this moment of her return. "How well you're looking, and how—how—— Decima, something has happened to you! Something that's altered you in a way that I can't describe. You never looked so happy, and with such a light in your eyes, nor even on the first night of the play! Sit down! Take your things off! Let me give you another kiss, you dear, sweet thing! And now tell me all about it! The voyage! The adventures you hinted at! Did you find that mysterious island—why didn't you tell me more about it? Did you find it, and is that what makes you look so heavenly radiant and running over with joy?"

"Yes, I found it, Polly," replied Nina, "but it was something else I found that makes me so happy. You'll never guess! Come closer and I'll—I'll whisper!"

Polly knelt beside her, and Nina, blushing like a schoolgirl, whispered one word, at which Polly shrieked:

"What! A husband! Decima! Who—who is he? Tell me quick, quick!"

And when Nina had told her that, and a great deal more—in fact, the history of the wreck and her strange marriage—Polly, all a-heap on the floor, could only stare at her, open-mouthed with wonder, delight, and awe.

"Married—married all the time! And to an earl! And you are a countess! Lady Lesborough! Oh, poor Lord Sutcombe!" Nina laid her hand on Polly's lips. "A countess! And been one all the time! And here was I treating you as if you were a mere nobody, just like myself! And yet, somehow, I always suspected——"

"That I was a princess in disguise! 'Changed at my birth with the rightful owner,' as the Irishman said. You dear, foolish Polly! As if it made any difference who and what I am! And—and I think you will like my husband, dear."

Polly emitted an "Oh! Like him. I—shall be afraid. An earl, a real English earl. De—I mean, Lady Lesborough!"

"You dare! 'Decima,' if you please. Oh, no, you won't be afraid of him. What nonsense! You are not afraid of Lord Sutcombe!"

"Oh, but he's only a viscount, or whatever it is, and yours is a real, belted earl!" explained Polly, with delicious naivete. "What is he like, Decima?"

Nina laughed softly, and her eyes grew dreamy and fond.

"He is tall and very straight, with broad shoulders; and he is very strong and good-looking; quite bronzed and tanned, with eyes that——" She broke off with a laugh at herself. "Oh, he is a son of the gods—not our galley gods, Polly, but the Olympian ones; 'a model of grace, and full of virtue'; but his chief one is that he condescends to love poor little me!"

Polly looked up at the radiant face, the graceful figure, and, laughing, tossed her head scornfully.

"As if he could help it! I'd like to see any man who could! Married!" Then she sighed. "You'll write no more plays, Decima; that's sure and certain! It's a pity."

"It's not at all sure and certain," said Nina. "Why shouldn't I? No one will know that 'Herbert Wood' is Lady Lesborough; and if they did! But you must talk it over with my husband when you meet him tonight."

"Tonight!"

"Yes," said Nina, laughing at her tone of awe. "Here is a note from Lady Vivienne. She wants us all to go to the Momus tonight, and come back to supper with them. I am looking forward to it so much!"

* * * * * * * * *

The play went splendidly that evening, and Nina sitting well behind the curtain of the box, was all aglow with pleasure and honest pride in her work. It was sweet to see Vane applauding and looking over the delighted audience with glowing eyes, as if he were saying: "Clap away; shout your hardest, good folk; my wife wrote this play."

They went home to Everleigh Court, where the Sutcombes had provided a supper, which, if it had not been so substantial, would have been suspiciously like a wedding breakfast; and, at Vane's warm greeting and the friendly look in his frank eyes, all Polly's awe and nervousness fled.

"I little thought, Miss Bainford, when I was watching you act, with the greatest admiration, that I was looking at my wife's dearest and best friend," he said, as he held her hand in his warm grasp. "I can't tell you how often she and I have spoken of you, or how much I have wanted to see you and—thank you! I hope you will share your friendship for her with me. Will you?"

It was a very happy little party, though every now and then a shadow stole over Vane's face. He could not altogether get rid of the memory of Julian—of the white, livid face, with its black eyes gleaming from their dark hollows.

"What do you think will become of him?" he had asked Letchford and Sutcombe earlier in the evening.

"He'll leave England," said Sutcombe. "Has gone already, no doubt."

"And will drink himself to death or get killed in a drunken row in the slums of Paris or Vienna," Letchford had suggested.

"He must be found," Vane had said quietly. "He must be found and—provided for."

"We'll put Tressider onto him," was Sutcombe's idea. "He will know better how to track him down than you can."

Vane tried to get his unhappy cousin out of his mind, and, as the supper progressed, had nearly, in some measure, succeeded, when Sutcombe's man came to his master's side and said something in a low voice. With a murmur of apology Sutcombe rose and left the room, and presently he returned, and quietly beckoned to Vane. Vane went out to him, and Sutcombe shut the door and drew him toward the library.

"I'm afraid something's amiss, Lesborough," he said. "Poor old Chandos Orme is in there. He tells a rambling, incoherent story. He wants to see you, and, hearing you were here, has come on after you."

They entered the library. Sir Chandos was seated at the table, a glass that had contained brandy, which Sutcombe had given him, already empty. He rose and held out a shaking hand to Vane.

"How d'ye do, Vane?" he stammered uncertainly. "Thought I should find you here. I say, you—you—know——" He paused to shuffle his false teeth into place. "What's the meanin' of all this? I—I don't understand it, don't you know!"

"All what, Sir Chandos?" said Vane gravely. "Is anything the matter?"

"Anything the matter? Dash it all, you ought to be able to answer that question! Sutcombe, for God's sake give me another drink! I'm—I'm so upset and shaky that I can scarcely know what I'm sayin' or doin'! Thanks! a little more. I—I like it strong. No—no water. Water's no good; it's the brandy I want!"

They watched him as he drank the neat spirit—he reminded Vane of Julian—spilling some of it on his quivering chin and down his shirt front; then he turned to Vane and, in a somewhat firmer voice, repeated his question:

"What's it mean?" he demanded. "Must say it's a deuced queer kind of business; not at all the kind of conduct befittin' a gentleman, to say nothing of—personal friend, and a fellow one has trusted——"

"Tell me at once what you mean, Sir Chandos," said Vane.

"I'm talking about Judith; you know that well enough," retorted Sir Chandos.

"About Judith?" Vane's heart began to sink with a dark presentiment. "What about her?"

"Where is she? What have you done with her?" asked the old man, in a peevish tone.

"I!" Vane started. "I can't tell you. I've not seen Judith since—for many months."

"Oh, that's all tommy-rot, you know!" snapped Sir Chandos, with impatient irritability. "That dog won't fight. You sent for her——"

"I!" said Vane. "No, no; you're mistaken!"

"No, I'm not!" snarled the old man fiercely. "It's no good your standing there lying about it. I've—I've got the proof in my possession. You sent for her; you know where she is! And I shay itsh not the straight thing between gentlemen, between you and me, who ought to be father-in-law—son-in-law——"

He looked helplessly round and began to feel for the empty glass. Vane caught his arm.

"For God's sake, try to explain what you mean!" he said earnestly. "You say that Judith is—missing. When—where—how did she go?"

"Oh, drop it, Lesborough! You've got the gel, right enough. If you mean well by her, if you want to marry her, why not say so—why not do the whole thing in an open and proper manner? Is there any more brandy in that decanter, Sutcombe?"

Vane still held him by the arm.

"Presently, presently!" he said anxiously. "Sir Chandos, on my honor, I do not know where your daughter is——"

Sir Chandos drew himself up with the shadow of his old dignity.

"That's a lie!" he said. "And this proves it!"

As he spoke, he fumbled in the pocket of his dress coat, and drew out a telegram, and extended it with a shaking hand. Vane seized the telegram and read it, aloud:

"I am alive and well," it ran. "Forget and forgive the past! I want you. Come to me at 24 Ponson Street, Chelsea, this afternoon, five o'clock. VANE."

He stared at the words in silence, and uncomprehendingly, for a moment; then he uttered a cry and drew Sutcombe out of the room, closing the door after them.

"My God!" he said, in a whisper. "I did not send this! Don't you see who did! He asked for a telegram form, wrote this message, and must have sent it from the station. We must go at once—at once! Send Letchford in to keep the poor old man quiet till we return! Come! There's not a moment to lose! Five o'clock! Hours ago! Time for—for anything to happen! The worst!"

In five minutes, or less, they were in a cab and on their way. They reached the house—Vane recognized it at a glance—and found it apparently empty. The heavy door at which they knocked remained closed to them.

Vane hailed a policeman.

"There is nothing else for it!" he said. In a few words he explained his fears, and the policeman, climbing to the lower window, forced an entrance. He opened the door to Vane and Sutcombe, and, by the light of his lantern, they rushed up the stairs. As they did so, a strong odor of chemicals met them.

Vane groaned. He knew that odor!

"There's a fire somewhere, sir!" said the policeman. "Curious kind of a smell! quite suffocating! Seems to come from this room. Door's locked!"

"Force it, force it!" cried Vane hoarsely.

They set their backs to it, and presently the lock gave, and they almost fell in. The lantern was raised, and its light flashed round the somber room in which Vane had eaten his first meal with Julian Shore. The room was so full of the pungent smoke, the horrible mist, that for a time they could not discern anything; then, as some of the fumes escaped by the open door, they saw two figures. One was that of a woman lying back in one of the antique chairs. The form was motionless, the face white, the eyes wide open and staring. At her feet was stretched out the figure of a man, his face white as hers, his eyes staring upward at the face of the woman he had loved and—slain!

They bent over these two awful objects in silent horror, then the policeman shook his head.

"Lady's dead, gentlemen," he whispered.

The man lying at her feet was dead also, his fingers closed in a steellike grip on her skirt.

Vane staggered to the door of the laboratory. A small flame was still flickering in the spirit furnace, and the deadly fumes were still issuing feebly from the last dregs of the infernal compound in the iron crucible.

Sick and faint, half choking, as he had choked in the Wizard's Room, Vane knocked the pot from its place and, staggering to the window, broke some panes of glass. Then he sprang back to the two motionless figures in the vain hope that the policeman might be deceived.

But the policeman would not let him touch them.

"No use, sir," he said, with a shake of the head. "They're both dead—dead as they can be. Awful kind o' death, too! An accident, I suppose, in the other room."

"Yes, yes!" Vane got out hoarsely. "I—I know the man—the lady. It is an accident while experimenting with chemicals—you can see them there."

The Policeman nodded, and, going to the window, blew his whistle.

"I must have some help, gentlemen. You'll stay here, please, till my mate comes, and we can send to Scotland Yard."

* * * * * * * * * *

The friends of Lady Lesborough—and how numerous they are—are never tired of dilating upon the romance of her life. And yet none of them, excepting the Letchfords and the Sutcombes, those friends of friends, whose lips are closed, know the whole of the story of her life. Few, for instance, are aware that Lord and Lady Lesborough, before they came to live at the Court, were remarried quietly in the quietest of country churches; few know the real story of Julian Shore's crime, and the tragedy at the gloomy house in Chelsea. And, though they know that the Lesboroughs and Sutcombes draw vast wealth from the Great Fairy Isle Gold Company, they do not know the real reason why the earl and countess, nearly every year, spend some weeks, in the island from whence the gold comes, or that those weeks are perhaps the happiest of their happy lives.

It is good to be at the old Court, served by willing servants, and surrounded by the tenants, who regard the earl and countess with affection; it is good to be in London, where Nina reigns as a queen, by right of her beauty and her grace; it is good to be with the true and tried friends whose love and sympathy are so precious to Nina and Vane. But it is best of all to stand alone, side by side, husband and wife, upon the beach above the strip of golden sand, over which ripples the tide that washes the Fairy Isle. To know that, though all else were to vanish like the airy fabric of a dream, their love would still remain, and with it the memory of the days when, without their knowing it, their hearts were drawing together never to part while the life beat in them.

It was Lady Fanworthy who summed up the case of Vane and Nina so neatly.

"You see," she said to Vivienne one evening when they were seated on the terrace at Lesborough, and both the ladies' eyes were half absently watching the earl and countess as they strolled to and fro across the lawn, talking together like sweethearts, "you see, they are so old-fashioned."

"Old-fashioned?" echoed Vivienne, waking from her reverie.

"Yes. That's why they are so happy. It is very old-fashioned to be in love at all; it is hopelessly old-fashioned to be in love with your husband or your wife; and, if you are so unfortunate as to be so, it is, so I am told, criminally old-fashioned to own up to it. I myself prefer the old fashion to the new; but, then, I'm eccentric—so I hear. Nina! Come off that grass; it's damp. Vane, bring her in at once."

THE END.

Awful Luck! A Christmas Wail

By Charles Noel Douglass (Uncle Charlie)

Copyright, 1913, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

Christmas Day is here again. Wond'rin' I ain't glad?
Wouldn't wonder if you knew just what makes me sad.
Sandy Claws has been and gone, vanished out of sight,
Didn't bring me what I wanted; I could cry outright.
He came down the chimney, but only got half-way,
Chimney wasn't big enough, stayed there half the day,
Slid down to the middle, and there poor Sandy stuck;
Tore house half down to get him out—Awful Luck!

Dinner was a fizzle, thought I'd get a treat,
Beats the Dutch the silly things some folks like to eat.
Fool around a-swallerin' soup; always wondered why
They would waste so much good space, an' leave no room for pie.
Folks seemed to enjoy theirselves, but Jim and Sister Nell
Chewed up the cranb'ry sauce, and didn't leave poor me a smell.
Then Mother cooked a turkey, while I just wanted duck.
Six back teeth got aching too—Awful Luck!

Presents going round the house since the early morn;
Uncle Bill presented me with a three foot horn;
When you blow and blow it good you can have some fun,
Folks for sixteen miles around all get up and run.
Off I went to Grandmama's to wake her up a bit,
Give her some Christmas music, thought I'd make a hit.
Blew the horn in Grandma's ear till my lips got stuck,
She's deaf and didn't hear a note—Awful Luck!

Dad's looked kinder blue today, though he's stuffed with pie,
Got a yearning, longing look gleaming in his eye.
He's quite forgot to whistle, and he's quite forgot to hum;
When he does that, just bet your life Dad is feeling glum.
You see dad's brother, Uncle Jim, he's a kind of sport;
In his pocket I could see a flask that held a quart,
I saw him wink at Dad and say: "Have some old Kentucky,"
But Dad swore off a week ago—Awful Luck!

Aunt Samantha came last night, I was dreadful good;
Had a pile of gifts for me, so I understood;
Acted like an angel, let her kiss me twice,
Hate to have folks slobber me, but told her it was nice.
After breakfast, Aunt, she went and brought her presents out;
When I saw 'em coming, say, I sent up a shout.
Gave brother Bill an airgun, also an auto truck,
While all I got was Gospel hymns—Awful Luck!

Uncle Ned, who's bald of head, no hair on his dome,
Sandy Claws presented him with a brush and comb,
Grandmama, who for years had had no teeth within her mouth,
Had a tooth-brush sent her from a friend who lives down south.
Uncle Jeff, born stone deaf well say, I had to laugh,
Dropped dead almost, for parcel post brought him a phonograph.
I got a bob sled and some skates, best I ever struck;
Move to Florida next week—Awful Luck!

Comfort's League of Cousins

some of us need. It has been a great help to me. My husband's work calls him to the city to live while I prefer living in the country.

What Christ Said

I said, "I will walk in the fields,"
God said, "Nay, walk in the town."
I said, "There are no flowers there."
He said, "No flowers but a crown!"

I said, "But the fogs are thick
And clouds are veiling the sun."
He answered, "But hearts are sick,
And souls in the dark undone."

I said, "But the skies are black,
There is nothing but noise and din."
And He wept as He led me back,
"There is more," he said, "There is sin."

I said, "I shall miss the light,
And friends will miss me they say."
He answered, "Choose ye tonight,
If I must miss you or they!"

I pleaded for time to be given.
He said, "Is it hard to decide?
It will not be hard in Heaven
To follow the steps of your guide."

We are apt to think or please ourselves too much instead of God and others.

I had the opportunity of hearing a gentleman speak at a lodge of International Order of Good Templars of which I am a member. He told the following incidents. I think they are worth repeating and may help some person.

A little boy was sent to bed in the dark, for his mother told him he was large enough to go alone and she didn't want him to carry a light. His sister felt sorry for him and went ahead holding the candle so he could see. He wanted to carry it and she said:

"No, mamma said you shouldn't carry it."

Then he asked: "Do you think it will shine in my room?"

She answered, "Yes," and remained in the brother's room holding the candle until he fell asleep. Years later, when they were both grown the boy went away and became a great drunkard. For a long time, the sister wrote to him and prayed for him but after a while she became discouraged and gave up. One day she received word saying her brother was very sick and when the sister went to see him he said:

"Do you remember how you held the light for me when I was small? If you hadn't given up praying and writing to me I wouldn't be in the condition I am today. But promise me this, that you will help other boys before it is too late."

She promised and he passed away. We often become discouraged just as this girl did and we give up. This has certainly been a lesson to me. I will write another good incident he gave.

A school teacher went every Sunday afternoon to the city to teach some children of the slums. While she was sitting in their midst she couldn't think of anything to say so asked the children what she should talk about and one of them said:

"Tell us how to be happy." The teacher thought "how can I tell these little children how to be happy. They are scantily clad, have very little to eat and such poor homes. My pupils I teach at school have everything to make them happy." She prayed over the matter and then she said:

"I will tell you how I try to be happy. Promise me you will keep my rules every day for a week and then next Sunday you can tell me if they made you happy. The first thing I want you to do is to learn a verse of some poem or a verse in the Bible; second, look at something beautiful and third do something for somebody. Keep these rules every day."

Next Sunday one little girl ran up to the teacher and said:

"Teacher, I kept the rules but it was very hard at times. One day I was very tired and everything went wrong and I didn't see how I could be happy, but I looked out of the window and I saw a bird taking a bath and it made me feel happy. Then, too, I often looked at my pretty brother I couldn't help it for I took care of him."

This gentleman's theme was, "Do something for somebody and it will help you to be happy." Just as this child found it hard at times to be happy, we too will find it hard, sometimes. If we try to do anything say in our own strength we will fail but if we ask God to help us He will. Some sisters may say God doesn't give me what I ask for. I will give you a verse of a poem in explanation.

"If our prayers were always answered,
Many, many times we'd fail.
Thus we learn to know Him better,
For His way is best of all.

"So my friend when doubts assail you,
And you know not how to pray,
Simply trust Him, learn to praise Him,
Wonderful will be God's way."

This poem has three other verses. I have another lovely poem entitled, "Give your sunshine to the living," which I shall send some time for the benefit of COMFORT readers.

I want to talk about one thing more and that is a smile. We never know how much a smile may mean to somebody else. Here is one instance. A young lady (this is a true instance), was working in a candy store and she never had much to say but no matter how tired and busy she was she was always smiling. One day a gentleman came in the store; he had been working hard, and he said: "How nice it seems to see a smiling face after working hard all day. It rests a

Childhood Adventures on a Texas Ranch

By Adele Steiner Burleson

Copyright, 1913, by Adele Steiner Burleson.
Serial right by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE.

"Toughey" is a true story in which the author narrates the actual exploits and adventures of her three children and her own experiences during a summer, some dozen years ago, happily spent in rusticating on her ranch in a remote and somewhat wild part of Texas, far from their city home. This large domain, known as Steiner Valley, was inherited by Mrs. Burleson from her father, Dr. Steiner, who as surgeon in the U. S. army served with distinction through the war with Mexico which added Texas and an empire besides to the territory of the United States.

In mentioning herself and her husband (now Postmaster General, but then member of Congress) in the story she has modestly assumed the name of "Deering" which our readers are at liberty to change to Burleson.

The ranch, which is several miles in extent, is in part cultivated as a cotton plantation and the rest is used as a range for Mr. Burleson's great herd of Hereford cattle. The plantation is worked entirely by convict labor supplied by the state in return for a certain per cent of the crop, and besides the manager's house and the owner's summer cottage there is a cluster of buildings called "the camp" occupied by the convicts and guards.

All this is new and of somewhat startling interest to the children who are accustomed to city life.

According to the habit of the family, the two younger girls, with only a year's difference in their ages and being fast friends and playmates, are classed together under the generic designation of "the children." The eldest daughter, who, though only twelve years old, is several years their senior and bears herself toward them with a patronizing air of elderly dignity and wisdom that at times is somewhat galling to the little girls, is nicknamed "Toughey." This pet name had been conferred on her in babyhood by a college girl aunt in admiration of the child's coolness, grit and self-reliance manifest even at that tender age.

Len, the manager's son, is a bright boy and proves a faithful and efficient guide and assistant on excursions and outdoor sports.

CHAPTER III.

BREAKING THE PONIES.

THE sun was high in the heavens the day when old Isum was seen approaching Pecan Hollow in charge of a bunch of ponies. They had arrived the Christmas before in the little girls' stockings and, differing in color, shape and blood, it was easy for each child to single out her own from the rest.

"That's mine," cried Toughey pointing to a bright-eyed bay mustang.

At the same moment the children claimed a stocky gray, plainly showing its Shetland blood, and a leggy sorrel of Arabian ancestry.

The others were black and unbroken.

THE CHILDREN FIND IT PLEASANTER TO RIDE DOUBLE ON DAISY.

"Ours are the prettiest," said the children, looking slyly at Toughy, evidently feeling that to say so first would establish the suggestion as a fact.

Toughey surveyed them and the ponies coolly and said:

"Oh, well, it's all right for you to think so!"

The emphasis irritated, as Toughey intended that it should.

"You know they are, yourself," they insisted.

Toughey shrugged her shoulders and again viewed the ponies critically, her head on one side.

"That little milk-sop is very nice," she said, "and so is the sorrel if he didn't look quite so much like a long-legged spider."

This was too much!

"We wouldn't have your old pony!" they exclaimed, on the verge of tears.

Mamma, coming out on the gallery just then to see the ponies, the contest was suspended, but Toughey, whose vindication of her natural supremacy over the children was always followed by special acts of grace towards them, was soon busy, with the boy's help, saddling, bridling and trying their ponies as well as her own.

Daisy, the little gray, was found to be so easy and gentle, and could be mounted with so little difficulty from the ground, and the sorrel, though without vices, had so few virtues in comparison that the children by common consent turned him over to their mother and confined themselves to Daisy. A community of interest and habit also made it pleasanter for them to ride double, and although there was no lack of debate as to whose turn it was to ride in front or who should open the gates to be met on all sides during their rides, their differences were never too sharp for speedy and amicable settlement, and never had the edge that distinguished their troubles with Toughey.

It was surprising how readily they all learned not only to ride but to become really at home in the saddle. Even Mrs. Deering's nervous fears were in time allayed and she came to regard their rides as a matter of course and not something to be worried about.

As the weeks passed and Toughey learned better the temper of her mustang and felt herself his master, she began to rejoice in his roving eye and quick nerves. Every ride was a tonic, every gallop quickened hand and eye, braced and hardened her spirit.

"Let's break Bruce," she proposed one day to the boy. She wanted to conquer, to subdue. Bruce was the largest of the three unbroken ponies.

"Papa said that those ponies would hardly need breaking, that they were just as gentle as housecats," argued Toughey, seeing the doubtful look on Len's face.

"That Arabian blood is very gentle, papa says," she concluded, anxious that Len shouldn't think her suggestion wild or impractical.

"I'm ready," the boy hastened to say, stiffening a little with the thought that she might consider him afraid.

"You must rope him," decided Toughey. She had never seen anything roped.

"I reckon I'll have to if I get him," said Len quietly. Toughey blushed.

"I thought——" she stammered.

"That Bruce really is a house-cat?" Len interrupted with lifted brows.

"Papa said the ponies were all so gentle," she repeated doubtfully and then stopped.

Len made no reply to this and set about looking for a rope. His own lariat, usually tied to his saddle, had been borrowed that morning by a guard, and Pecan Hollow, after a rummaging search in which Toughey joined, seemed to afford no kind of substitute.

"Take the swing," exclaimed Toughey suddenly, her roving eye catching sight of the children's suspended from an elm bough.

Without a word Len climbed the tree, unknotted the rope and together they walked to the little pasture adjoining the enclosure in which the house was set and where they could now see Bruce quietly cropping the short mesquite grass.

Approaching slowly they were hardly within roping distance when the pony bounded away to the other end of the pasture and disappeared behind a small thicket. Cutting through this thicket, Len and Toughey tried to come quietly upon him, but they found him with lifted head evidently on the lookout, and they had no sooner come into the open before he was off again. Once more they tried to slip upon him and once more the pony put the length of the pasture between them.

"Let's run him down," suggested Toughey.

"What! run down a house-cat!" exclaimed Len with grim surprise.

Toughey gave an embarrassed laugh and then said rather pertly:

"I didn't expect him to trot right up to us, but I don't consider him exactly a man-eating tiger."

Len made no reply; he shut his lips tightly as if to keep back the words, and renewed his efforts to capture the pony. Up and down the pasture the little brute led him and Toughey until at the end of half an hour they paused breathless and crimson from exertion.

"It's no use," said Len, "I'll never get him this way; I'll saddle Daisy and drive him into the lot."

As the little gray dragged a foot of chain from one of her forefeet, Len caught her without difficulty and with Toughey's help in opening gates and heading off they soon had Bruce penned in the small calf lot. Here Len roped him without trouble, and to Toughey's satisfaction the pony submitted to his bondage with grace, permitting them to lead him to the house with only the smallest amount of coaxing. He was led around and about and showed so much gentleness that even the children were allowed to help in this part of the breaking process.

"This is the first step," exclaimed Len. "We'll tie him to a tree now and see how he'll stand that."

Len secured the rope to a little elm whose branches extended over the roof of the porch, and Toughey and the children stroked the pony's soft nose.

"I never saw anything so gentle," Toughey could not forbear saying with a glance at Len.

Just then Bruce's ears flattened, his eyes showed white, and throwing his weight against the rope it snapped like a thread and he trotted briskly away.

Toughey gazed after him with open chagrin. Len smiled.

"I'll get a new halter at the store this afternoon that he can't break," he said.

True to his word, Len made the trip across the river and the same afternoon arrived with the halter at Pecan Hollow.

Bruce was driven into the calf lot, as before, and easily captured within its narrow limits. In addition to the halter Len put on him a light saddle to which the pony made no protest.

"I'll ride him if you'll lead him," said Toughey to Len. The boy hesitated.

"We must go slowly," he remarked.

"I'm not afraid," said the girl stoutly. She wanted to prove that she believed the pony to be gentle and that she was willing to do quite as much as she expected of Len.

Without waiting for him to object, Toughey mounted quickly. The pony quivered a little and then quietly followed Len's lead.

"Don't put your feet in the stirrups," warned the boy, "and be ready to jump if he's ugly."

Toughey tried hard not to smile but she did and Len saw it. His face clouded and he bit his lip.

"You don't know all that an unbroken horse can do," he said gravely.

This time Toughey laughed outright.

"I declare Len," she began gaily, "you talk as if Bruce was an ordinary pony. Why he's half Arab and they are just like—like—kittens," she finished.

Bruce lowered his head and bolted. Len swung to the halter—it tore like a ribbon. Then he threw himself back on the lariat which he had taken the precaution to fasten around the pony's neck. It began to slip swiftly through his hands in spite of his efforts to hold it.

"Jump," he shouted to Toughey.

For a moment the girl hesitated and then half jumped, half tumbled to the ground. Rising quickly she gazed after Bruce as he tore madly across the creek bottom and into the thick grove of trees until she could no longer see him.

Then she walked slowly towards Len who was running to ask if she were hurt.

"Not the least bit," she said shakily, and then she saw something that made her burst into tears.

The boy's hands had been cut and lacerated by the rope as it burnt its way through them.

"Oh, Len, Len!" cried Toughey in an agony of remorse. "It's all my fault!"

"No, I'm to blame. I knew better and you didn't."

Mrs. Deering bound up the injured hands in cotton and Toughey helped with a quivering face.

When Len was leaving for Camp, Toughey said humbly:

"I know now, Len, that breaking a pony is not quite like picking up a kitten."

The boy smiled gratefully, but after that Bruce was always called "Toughey's House-cat."

person." This wasn't said as a compliment but was meant as one.

I could think of plenty to write but I am afraid my letter is too long already, so will bring it to a close with best wishes to all the sisters,

MRS. LILLIE O'BEIRNE.

Mrs. O'Beirne. While you do not say so in so many words, I take it for granted that you do not yield to your desire to stay in the country, since your husband's work necessitates his living in the city. Do you not think your duty lies in being with him, to aid and cheer him? So many wives regard their husbands as mere meal tickets that I often blame the women for a large percentage of the divorces. Perhaps I may incur the enmity of some of my fair readers by thus speaking, but on the whole, do you not agree with me? If you do not, I shall be glad to hear your defense.

Your rules for happiness are very good and could be followed advantageously by all. I recommend the last particularly, try to do some kindness to someone. It may mean a slight sacrifice on your part at the time, but you will feel well repaid in the end. Then again, we are too prone to let the beauties of Nature pass by without notice. Fortunate is the person who can find pleasure in a beautiful sunset, the vivid coloring of an autumn wood, a snow-clad landscape or in the thousand and one things we see, with unseeing eyes, every day. Beside them, the petty worries of the day seem small.

I, for one, shall cut out your poems for my scrap book. The words,

"Simply trust Him,—learn to praise Him!
Wonderful will be God's way."

are a sermon in themselves and will find a ready response in many hearts which at this holy Christmas-time, of all times, should be filled with God's love.—Ed.

SUMMERVILLE, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you admit a Missourian into your circle? You may have to "show me" around some, but I don't suppose any of you will mind that in the least for I believe you are a good-hearted set.

I've been watching the COMFORT Sisters' Corner for some time to see if there were any stepmothers who had courage to write. At last I've seen two, Mrs. J. W. Conrad and Mrs. Rosa E. Baker. Brave women. I call them brave because I think any woman is brave that will step in a home to become a mother to one or more children.

I will not describe myself, but will give a short sketch of my life. Born and reared on a farm, I married at the age of twenty-three and lived in Kansas City one year. Then my husband was sent out on the road, as he was an iron worker. I have entered seventeen states of the Union and made three trips into old Mexico. My husband assisted in putting in the wharf at Manzarmellon on the Pacific Coast that the American gunboats blew up. The saddest part of my story is that my husband, Scott Jones, was killed while in Mexico and was buried at Guadalajara. So if any sister should see this in print that lives at Guadalajara I would be delighted to hear from her. After my husband's death I returned to the U. S. and married a man with three girls, ages nine, eleven and fourteen. Sisters, I never realized what being a mother was until I had unshouldered my gun and was in the midst of battle. I won. But won with love and good advice given to them by good neighbors. Some people think that if a stepmother corrects a child she is mean to it. Sisters, didn't our mothers correct us? Most surely they did, and if they had not, what kind of a world would this have been? The first day I entered their home each greeted me with a kiss and from that day up to the present time, almost six years ago, I have taken the greatest interest in them.

I take an interest in selecting and making their clothing and in educating them. They go to school eight months out of twelve, never miss a day unless weather or health prevents. I also take an interest in what company they keep, and I go with them to church and Sunday school, for I am interested in the saving of their souls. Not every woman is fit to be a mother, not every woman that has a well-furnished home and plenty to keep a child will make a good mother. Unless we have that mother love and are willing to make a sacrifice for children we had better let them remain where they are even if they are in an orphan's home, and this being a mother we should consider well, before we take a child in our home to be a mother to. I would like to hear from every stepmother that reads this. Please give your experience in being a stepmother and I'll answer all if I don't receive over fifty.

May God bless you all is my prayer,

MRS. BEDIE MARTIN.

Mrs. Martin. Whether you are from Missouri or not we are glad to "show you" and, as you say, I think we are rather a good-hearted set. You must have had some interesting experiences in your travels with your husband and we sympathize with you in your past sorrow as much as we now rejoice with you in your present happiness. The three girls are indeed fortunate to have gained such a good mother and I am sure they appreciate all you do for them—if they do not now, they will later. What we would like though is the story of some stepmother who has had real difficulties to surmount in the manner of interfering relatives or unruly children for I know there must be some among our number who have been confronted by that problem. Won't you tell us the secret of your success?—Ed.

LAKE BAY, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

With your permission I am coming to greet you once more. Whether or not it will be the last, I cannot say, as healthwise I am to say the least, very "poorly," often unable to write at all.

I would like to say: I have always advocated that a girl if born sound mentally and physically, and allowed to develop her strength and muscles as nature intended, in the fresh air and sunshine, to romp, climb, run, play, and work more or less, according to her age, to share equally the outdoor life with her brother, she would be his equal in strength.

The letter in September COMFORT from Miss Bessie Gress is surely one proof of the correctness of my belief. Her labors on the farm do not seem to have demoralized her in any way. I should judge her to be intelligent, moral and refined.

Some say there are certain obstacles the female sex has to contend with that prohibit her from doing the same as the other sex. I do not believe, however, that the natural functions of life would thus interfere.

About twenty years ago, in Inyo county, California, quite a large number of Pierte Indians were one day on a trip to the next town and stopped to rest, and refresh themselves near our house. I chanced to go a short distance in the rear of one of the chicken coops to look for eggs and found there one of the squaws alone. "Papoose!" she said, holding up her new-born babe for my inspection.

A short time later they resumed their journey, the Indian woman with her babe in her arms. I invited her to come in and remain until the others returned, but she laughed at me saying:

"Me no white squaw," and walked off apparently as strong as the other women.

Her life, and that of her foremothers, as well as fathers, had been in the open air. There she had played as a child, and later toiled. She was actually as strong as a man, as I later learned. Living and sleeping in close rooms, with a diet of rich food, and candies at any time, corsets, tight, high-heeled shoes, heavy skirts, and habitual late hours are not conducive to health and strength, to either physical or mental vigor.

THE COCA-COLA CO., Atlanta, Ga.

At the risk of making my letter too long, I am going to add a few lines in reply to "Grandma." I disbelieve not merely in corporal punishment, but in any punishment whatever.

When living in my old Vermont home, one day in early spring I missed my little girl of six years, and from a window saw her running back and forth, in high glee, through a large puddle in the street, caused by melting snow.

I called her in, removed her soaked footwear, bathed her feet in warm water, and dressed them in warm, dry shoes and stockings. Meanwhile I said to her:

"Dearie, if you wade in that cold snow water it will probably make you very sick. You might even die like papa and little brother, and mamma would be left alone with no one to love her. Do not do it again."

She did however later in the day. I again called her in, and gave her a repetition of the treatment, and talk. The latter somewhat emphasized.

There must have been something extremely fascinating about it, for I never knew her to be so persistent before. I called her in the third time, put the last pair of dry shoes on her feet, tied her ankles together, saying nothing.

"Why do you punish me this way mamma?" she queried.

"My dear child," I returned, "I am not doing this to punish you, but to save you from great suffering if nothing more. You did not heed what mamma said to you, and I knew I must do something. Now that you cannot walk for a while I want you to sit here quietly and think about all mamma said to you, and remember that she is many times older than you are, and understands better what is best and right for her little girl to do and not do."

About an hour later, with her arms around my neck she said: "I have been thinking mamma, I've been awful naughty. I'll try to think first, before I do things next time, and be your little comfort just as you want me to be."

Now, really, was not that better than if I had whipped her, or managed what I did in such a way as to cause her to think it was a punishment?

I am not quite seventy-eight years of age, but am often called grandma. I enjoy it, and greatly wish I was a "truly" grandma.

There is much I would like to say, but must not this time. If I live, and am able, I will come again "another day."

SADIE MAGOON GIEVE.

Mrs. Gieve. You have opened up a subject that admits of much discussion. Many people contend that a woman does not need as much actual strength as a man, though we all admire the athletic type of girl who can display muscles equal to those of her brothers, better perhaps, for the average man of today is inferior to his forefathers in strength. It would seem that a revival of the simple life would do much good, though we can hope for better things of the coming generations now that attention is directed toward eugenics and proper child culture. Don't you think you really punished your little girl? To children of a certain temperament, what you did would have a more lasting effect than any other form of punishment. No matter how large the family, each child must be considered as an individual and governed according to his or her nature.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Dear old COMFORT; how I love you and those connected with it. We all look forward to your coming and welcome you gladly (even my husband).

This is a beautiful morning. It makes sunshine in our souls to see the sunshine around us, and we thank the Lord that we are alive this glorious day.

How I enjoy reading the sisters' letters. Some of you would make good preachers. Well, my gift is not preaching (I am sorry to say). I sometimes wonder what my gift is. It is being content with doing the little things, I think, because there has been no great opportunity offered me unless it is the rearing of five blessed children whom I would give my life for if necessity called.

It is a great responsibility. I do think mothers should get together and talk things over more and try

Ben Holland's Brownie

A Christmas Story for the Children

By Edna Collomore

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE Holland family was so large that it filled a big farmhouse almost full. There was Grandma and Grandpa Holland, Father and Mother Holland, Uncle George and Uncle Joe and Aunt Alice, besides Albert and Marian and Ethel and Roger and Charles and the baby. Oh, yes, there was Ben, too, only Ben didn't seem a bit like the others.

They liked to be together, but he liked to be by himself. Indoors he was usually in a corner by himself, reading, or sulking. Outdoors he went tramping off alone into the woods with a gun or a fish pole. He liked to catch and to kill things.

The other Hollands were all good natured and full of fun, but Ben scowled as often as they laughed, and he was always having the sulks, or just getting over one grumpy fit, or just getting ready to have another.

Mother was as sweet and patient with him as she could be, and so was grandpa and the others "made allowances" for him as much as they could.

They said, "Oh, that's just Ben's way," but really it is very trying to have a brother that says "Pooh!" and "How silly!" to everything you like to do.

At Christmas-time Ben was just awful. He made fun of little Roger's Christmas letter, and he told Charles that there wasn't any Santa Claus. Charles almost knew that, himself, for he was five, but he said, "Oh, I love to play that there is, can't I?" Ben said, "Yes, if you want to be a silly little goose." Wasn't that mean?

Marian and Ethel felt dreadfully because Ben wouldn't hang his stocking up with the others; they said it spoiled everything. Ben said he didn't care. Uncle Joe said very likely a boy might not get any Christmas presents if he wasn't willing to provide the only suitable and proper Christmas receptacle for them. Ben said he guessed he could stand that, he didn't know as he cared if he never saw another necktie, or handkerchief, or stick pin, or bottle of cologne. At that remark Grandma looked startled and so did Aunt Alice. It wasn't a nice thing for a boy to say the very night before Christmas was it?

Father Holland saw that it was time for him to tell a story, so he began a splendid one about the things that happen on Christmas night, how the fairies and brownies and elves come out and all good spirits have their will, how the cattle kneel in their stables, how iron cannot wound and serpents cannot sting because that one hour belongs to the Prince of Peace.

Everybody liked those stories. They kept begging for more, all but Ben. He listened, of course, but once in a while he said, "H'm, h'm," just as loud as he dared. By and by Albert got tired of that h'm, h'm. Even if it was the night before Christmas, he had made all the allowances for Ben that he possibly could make.

He said, "What are you saying h'm, h'm for? Don't you believe what father is saying?"

"Oh, they're just stories," muttered Ben uneasily.

"Oh, dear," said little Charles, "Isn't anything true, about the brownies or elves or anything?"

"Of course not," said Ben.

"Tut, tut," said Grandma.

"Perhaps you don't believe about the cows kneeling in their stalls on Christmas night," said Albert.

"No, I didn't, said Ben.

"Oh, oh," said Ethel and Marian and Charles and Roger.

"Well, I do," said Albert. He was older than Ben, so Ethel and Marian and Charles and Roger felt better. "And I tell you, Ben Holland, you don't dare to go out to the stable tonight, at midnight, and see whether it is true or not."

"Of course I dare," said Ben.

"Then do it," said Albert.

"I will," said Ben.

"Oh, don't go, Ben," pleaded little Roger. "The brownies and the elves won't like it, and they'll hurt you?

"Don't let him go mother," begged Ethel.

"He may go, said Mother Holland, smiling, "if he will dress very warm."

"And not wake everybody in the house up," said father.

"And take the stable lantern so that he won't set anything on fire," said Grandpa.

Just then the old clock said nine in its loudest tones. It was a loud-voiced clock anyway, but when it said eight o'clock on ordinary nights, or nine o'clock on Christmas eve, it positively shouted. Of course everybody went straight to bed, and because they really were good children they were soon fast asleep.

The old clock kept talking to himself, not very loud because there was nobody there to listen, "Tick-tock, tick-tock." By and by he called ten and then eleven. But midnight of Christmas eve is the most wonderful time in the whole year, and who should know that better than an old clock. When the clock said twelve, he rang it out so clearly and joyously that it woke Ben Holland up with the very first stroke, so he knew exactly what time it was.

He hurried into his clothes and, taking his shoes in his hand, crept down the back stairs. In the kitchen he lit the lantern, and put on his shoes, then he slipped back the big bolt and stepped out of doors.

How dark and cold it was? How bright and far away were the stars! The stable loomed big and black, and when he opened the door it was as if the stable were full of a big black silence that rushed out to meet him.

Ben entered bravely enough, swung his lantern high and looked all about him. He heard the even breathing of the cows; there they were, all kneeling in their stalls. The horses stamped a little restlessly, as if they resented his presence. Something small and dark flew down near the lantern, and then flew back to the rafters.

"I'm not afraid," thought Ben stoutly. "I'm going to stay here a long time, maybe until one o'clock. Then tomorrow I'll tell Albert that most of those stories are lies anyway."

Ben hung the lantern on its nail and sat down on a pile of hay. Another small dark thing flew down to the lantern, then another, and another. Pouf, the lantern was out. "Never mind," thought Ben. "I'll get used to this darkness in a minute."

But before his eyes could see what those small dim things were, his ears began to hear voices, tiny, buzzing voices like those of crickets.

"We can't play any tricks here; good people live here, and they believe in us. We must dance and bring them good luck."

"Yes, we'll dance."

"Oh, we like to play tricks, too."

"There's a boy on the hay."

"He must be a thief, here at midnight."

"Can he be one of the family?"

"Oh, no! Oh, no!"

"Their hair is red and straight, and his is brown and curly."

"They have dimples and he has a scowl."

"Doesn't he look ugly?"

"I've seen him in the woods shooting rabbits and squirrels."

"I heard him say there were no elves and brownies."

"We'll show him. Come on. Come on."

Tweak, tweak, tweak. The little people were tugging at his hair. Twist, pull, they were tying knots in it. Ben tried to drive them away, but they were like a hive of angry bees.

They buzzed in his ears, they pinched him and pulled him. They tickled him with straws, they pricked him with sharp sticks, and they kept crying: "He says there are no Brownies. We'll show him, we'll show him."

Just as one mischievous Brownie had crawled up under Ben's sleeve to find a new place to pinch, a voice called: "One o'clock, and the moon is up. Away! Away!"

There was a flurry around Ben's ears, a scampering sound, and then complete stillness. No—there was a little noise, just a faint whimper. It was the Brownie inside Ben's sleeve, struggling as hard as he could to get out. Ben put his hand up his sleeve and pulled the Brownie out. He held him firmly in his hand. The moon shone in through the stable windows.

What a cunning, funny little thing that Brownie was! How he squirmed and wriggled and tried to bite Ben's fingers with his sharp little teeth! "Let me go, you let me go," cried the Brownie, but Ben held him fast.

Then the Brownie began to plead eagerly. "Please let me go," he wailed. "I'm just a young Brownie and I've never been alone before, and if they go I can never find them." Tiny tears stood in the Brownie's bright little eyes. Ben, cross-tempered Ben, felt sorry.

"I wish I could keep you," he said, "but it would be mean. Run away, little Brownie."

Off hurried the Brownie. Ben could hear him bumping against the window, scampering up the wall, running along the rafters. He sat still on the hay, a little lonesome feeling in his heart.

Now, what was that, tugging at his coat? Why, it was the Brownie come back again!

"I can't find the others," cried the Brownie. "I don't want to stay here alone. I don't know yet what a Brownie has to do. I'm only a young Brownie. Oh! Oh!"

And Ben, ugly bad-tempered Ben, cuddled the Brownie close and whispered. "Don't cry. Stay and live with me. I'll take care of you. I'll always be good to you. Please, please stay with me."

"You won't want me," the Brownie wailed. "I bite and scratch. I tear up things and spoil things. I don't like to be good. They say I'm the most troublesome young Brownie they ever saw."

"I don't care," said Ben. "I want you. I'll never be cross to you. I'll take care of you. And next year, if you like, you can come to the barn on Christmas eve, and go away with the Brownies again."

"I'll stay," whispered the Brownie. He cuddled up close under Ben't coat where he could be warm. And Ben.—but don't you tell anybody—Ben leaned over and rubbed his cheek softly against the Brownie.

Six o'clock, said the clock loudly. He said that to wake up Ben; everybody else in the house had been awake an hour. Ben woke up quickly. Dear me, he was in his own bed! Suppose it had only been a dream after all. Still, something was snuggling up under his chin, and it felt like the Brownie. Why, what a funny, cute brown and black puppy. Could it be—it must be. Everybody knows that a Brownie has to change his shape in the daytime. Oh, what a jolly Christmas!

"Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas," they called to him from the stairs. "Hurry down to breakfast." So Ben hurried.

"Oh, did you go to the stable?" called all the children at once?

"Indeed he did," answered Uncle Joe, "I found him asleep on the hay, and brought him in to his own bed."

"The cattle were kneeling in their stalls, just as father said," acknowledged Ben promptly.

"What is that in your arms?" asked Ethel. "My, what an ug—I mean what a funny little dog."

"Let us see," cried everybody at once.

So Ben put the little fellow down on the floor. He looked at them with his bright eyes, and then began to try, as hard as he could, to chew and tear and pull to pieces the big braided rug. Everybody laughed at him. It was such a big, strong rug, and he was such a little puppy.

"What is his name?" asked Roger.

"Brownie," said Ben promptly.

"Ho, I thought there weren't any Brownies," said Albert.

"There's this one," said Ben, picking him up, and hugging him tight. "This is my Brownie."

and puddings. I have no brothers or sisters. I like to take care of flowers and gardens. My school teacher is going to have a hot bed at the school next summer. I am taking agriculture and the class is going to test seed corn next spring. My studies at school are reading, arithmetic, grammar, geography, physiology, agriculture, history, and spelling. I live six miles from Volga and two miles from Amery. I like a farm much better than a city. My birthday is in July. I can make button holes and our teacher takes an extra half hour Friday afternoons to teach us girls to sew.

I am hoping to see this letter in print.

Your loving niece,

SYLVIA PRATT. (League number 36,374.)

P. S. My grandma took COMFORT when mamma was a little girl of ten.

Sylvia, yours is a dandy letter. Many girls twice your age could not do as well. You say I can iron. What an industrious girl. I can understand people canning vegetables, but it does not seem to me that iron would be improved by canning. The nearest I ever came to canning iron was when I tried to eat a piece of steak yesterday. Iron preserves would certainly be a novelty on any table, and I must congratulate you Sylvia, on having brought them to our notice. Oh, slush! The Goat says you mean you can iron clothes. I'm so relieved. Judging from your next sentence you have a varied assortment of accomplishments for you tell us that you can embroider and make cakes and puddings. Oh! say girls, wouldn't it be immense to see Sylvia embroidering a rice pudding? I wonder if when you eat the pudding you have to swallow the embroidery too. Just fancy having an embroidered bean tank. If I had one I should feel so proud that I'd simply have to wear it outside instead of in. How lovely it would be when you ate a bean to hear it crop on the embroidery. The Goat says if you had put a comma after embroider we should never have had the pleasure and delight of tasting one of your embroidered puddings. What a blessing Sylvia that you didn't. So teacher is going to have a hot bed at the school next summer is she? That's quite an idea turning the school into a boarding-house. It seems to me teacher has more courage than the average individual, and what she wants with a hot bed in the summer-time gets me. I hope the bed won't get too hot or it might set fire to the school. Well most beds are hot in the summer, so perhaps there is not anything so remarkable about teacher having a hot bed after all. Of course she'll have her hose along in case of a conflagration. The Goat says you don't mean a bed to sleep in, but a bed for forcing the growth of various plants. Thank heaven! Whatever should I do without that Goat? We should all like to see you taking agriculture, Sylvia, all we hope is that wherever you take it you won't forget to bring it back. Agriculture is too valuable a thing to be made the football of anyone's fancy. Perhaps you mean you are studying agriculture. Let us fervently hope so. It's the finest study in the world. Anyone Sylvia, can make buttonholes. I've got about four hundred buttonholes in the coat I've got on at present, but the trouble is I've only one button to fill the holes and that isn't sufficient to go around. You see, like the rest of humanity, I'm a few buttons shy. I remember once on the first of April being sent to buy a quart of buttonholes and everybody gave me the laugh. I wonder why? I wish all teachers would teach all you girls to sew. An expert needlewoman can generally make a living and an expert agriculturist ought to be able to make a fortune, especially if she can can iron and sew buttonholes on hot beds.

CAL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I want to write you some facts: We live in a little lumber camp, three miles from a railroad station and the lumber company owns the town, all the houses and one grocery store. A week ago this company employed an old man about sixty-five years old to mow a field below my house. My children had some other children ranging in age from three to ten years playing in an apple tree adjoining the field. I, myself was standing watching the children play. This old man called for the children to stop their noise and go to the house. I told them to pay no attention to him, but not to talk back or bother him in any way. Finally he jumped off the mowing machine and came running, waving a new buggy whip at the children. They jumped and ran for me but one three-year-old baby fell at his feet. He began beating that baby. He cut its left cheek open from its ear to its chin. I called: "Stop man, stop!" but he continued to beat it. I saw he would not stop so I ran for help. He picked that baby up and threw him over a fence that goes by the barnyard.

When I and some women got back the blood was running out of both hands and arms and down the baby's cheek. Now these people had this man arrested. He is a well-to-do man and a big churchmember. The head owner of this lumber company is his friend. The next day after the arrest, our boss's wife came to my house. She said to me: "You are the only eye witness and I want you to stop this law suit. Go to those people and tell them to stop the suit."

I replied: "I will do nothing of the kind." She begged, she threatened, but I stood firm, and what will you say when I tell you that the next day I got a written order to move. Now stop and consider what that meant to me. My husband idle most all winter, as the mill had been closed, three babies ranging from two to eight, just ten dollars in the house and supplies at a low ebb. But I defied her just the same.

Well, the people here were mad and this rich woman left town for a visit. But very quietly this company's boss is working against us. My husband of course can get no more work here, and all because I won't lie. Is that not it? What else? Who says California is free? Who says a working man is not compelled to do as his boss says? When will this change? My husband got just two dollars a day when he did work, twelve dollars a week to keep five people on. That is why we have no home, with land too at from three hundred to five hundred dollars an acre.

A MOTHER.

I have the name and address of the party who wrote this leter, but for reasons only too obvious, I dare not print them. A thousand and one columns could be written around the statements contained in this letter. They display one of the ugliest phases of our social life, which at the best, God knows is ugly and sordid enough. The most vicious and dangerous symptoms of our national life is the lawlessness of our industrial autocrats and the way wealthy people and powerful corporations tyrannize over those in humbler circumstances. This condition of things is not peculiar to California. Dollar despotism rules with an iron rod in nearly every corner of the land, no matter whether it's a lumber company, a railroad corporation, a mercantile concern or a private individual. As long as these have wealth and the power wealth gives they can do pretty nearly as they like, and they only too often are not backward in letting the plain people know that they control the political and judicial machinery of the country, and that any attempt to fight them in the courts would only end in ruin and disaster. Crooked politicians and crooked business go hand in hand. They have the absolute mastery over the masses of the people. If the average man tries to buck this combination, and exasperated by wrong puts up a fight against conditions which make his red American blood seethe with anger, he is a marked man. There is just one thing for that man to do, seek fresh fields and pastures new and keep his tongue quiet. Scores of letters reach me from people who have been wronged and crushed by some petty political or industrial power in their various communities, and this, mind you, in democratic America where there are tons of law but very little justice. The tyranny of the dollar is everywhere. Most of our states have been in existence long enough to have bred a high type of manhood, a manhood imbued with a high sense of justice and saturated with the noblest kind of civic ideals. But, alas, this type of man is woefully rare in most of our communities. If such men appear the interests grab them, hypnotize them with the rustle of greenbacks and make them their tools and their creatures, and thus are the masses left without a single friend or a single champion. A thousand pities that it is so, for when men are stung to madness by injustice they take advantage of every possible opportunity to avenge themselves upon those who have wronged them and become enemies of society as a whole. It is the tyranny of the dollar that is creating anarchists by the thousands. Our government has a committee that is inquiring into industrial conditions the country o'er and the facts it has brought to light are simply appalling. Let me give you a little idea of how the dollar gets in its fine work in this home of the free and land of the brave. In a manufacturing city here in the East the wives of the big factory and mill owners were quite horrified to find the people were dying off from tuberculosis like flies. The good ladies got together to discuss ways and means for combatting these awful conditions. Their first step was to send to a nearby city for a trained nurse who had had considerable experience with tuberculosis cases and also as a settlement worker. The nurse went to work and when she sent in her report the good ladies had fourteen fits, for the investigator reported the people who were dying from tuberculosis were all mill workers, employees of the ladies' husbands, and this frightful loss of life was due to improper nourishment, lack of ability, owing to low wages, to buy proper food, and the frightfully unsanitary conditions of the ramshackle tenements in which the workers lived, all owned, too, by the way, by the good ladies' husbands. Did the good ladies try to improve matters? Not at all. They considered the report and the recommendations contained therein as a piece of impertinence and without further parleying suppressed the report and dismissed the nurse. The trained nurse however, was a real reformer and a determined fighter and made up her mind that all the city should know what was in the report. Naturally the nice, kind newspapers, wouldn't dare to print it for, as I have told you before, we have a press, but it is largely subsidized by wealthy interests. Anyway the lady with the conscience and the paralyzing facts, got on the street corners and started to tell the city what she had discovered. But she didn't tell them much. The nice, kind police took care of that, for they grabbed her for the infraction of some bylaw such as obstructing traffic, and maybe also for trying to obstruct tuberculosis, and before she knew it she was finishing the balance of her speech in a prison cell. This is the way the game always goes and such instances are constantly occuring. For the irascible old man who whipped this poor little baby, we can only have pity. The most charitable thing to say about him would be that anger had temporarily deranged his mind. For the lumber company that owns the town, and therefore all the machinery of government it contains, we can have nothing but wholesome respect. We live under a game of grab and as long as we are contented to have the wonderful resources, which the good God has been thousands of years perfecting for our use, yanked from the mountain-side and ground into profit for a few greedy individuals who are monarchs of all they survey, we must expect lawlessness and indifference to the rights of others. In California the women are now voting, and they now have a chance to better the evil conditions that obtain in so many sections of our big land, and the first thing that the women and all law-abiding citizens and intelligent voters should do is to strengthen the hands of the law and put a ring in the nose of the dollar hog and the despotism that follows in his trail.

NEW BADEN, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

The boys and girls at this place are entering into an oratorical contest and my subject is: "Should Educational Qualification be Required for Voting?"

I have written to several places for articles on it but I have not received any yet. If you have any articles on the subject I shall be very, very glad to get them. And if you have any please send them right away, as soon as the last of next week if possible and you will greatly oblige me by doing so.

FAYE BURCH.

My dear Faye, I cannot write special articles for oratorical contests. I'm glad to know that you young people are thrashing out momentous questions of public policy, but for these discussions to be of any value you ought to prepare for them months before the discussions come off. It's no good going off half cocked. All these things need serious thought, and you want to get all your material together and your facts in order before you start your debating. I do not supply material for debates except what I hand out through the columns of COMFORT. Education is not only required for voting, but it is required for everything. The simplest thing we do in this life can be done better by an educated than by an uneducated man. The brain is the center of the intelligence and the more the brain is cultivated, the larger the crop of intelligent actions and thought it will produce. The animal is guided by instinct the man by reason. Savage man built his fire in the forest and after he had gone away the apes and monkeys gathered round the fire and took comfort in its warmth, but not one monkey ever had sense enough to throw a piece of wood on the dying fire so as to keep it alive. It's a mighty good thing for us that Mr. Monkey didn't have the sense to keep the fires going or we would have had all our forests burned down. It does at first sight seem preposterous to allow uneducated people, people whose thinking apparatus is but a peg above that of the monkey, to have a vote in deciding the destinies of a great nation, but as there is always a chance for a man who goes to church to become a Christian, so there is always a chance for a man who goes to the ballot box to learn something about what he is voting for, and not more than one man in twenty-five does know what he is voting for. The child who is never allowed to go in the water will never swim, and a man who never goes near the ballot box because he is ignorant, will never have the incentive to be anything else but ignorant. This is supposed to be a free country, and as soon as we start deciding which man shall vote and which shan't, it ceases to be a free country. A man will never know how to shave unless you give him a razor. The fact that he cuts his throat a few times in experimenting with a razor is no reason why we should take the razor from him. He will have to carve himself up a few times before he learns how to handle that razor. It's just the same way with the man who goes to the polling booth. He does not know how to use his ballot any more than a blind donkey, or an unborn mule, and so he votes for Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller otherwise the republican party, much to the delight of the gentlemen who own that party, and

A Christmas Makeshift

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

CHAPTER I.

THE rampant wind chased hilariously down the streets of the shopping district, and with a shout, a roar and a volcanic eruption of sharp, sandy snow, turned a few somersaults, and tried to induce a cringing little woman, who was attempting to cross the street and at the same time shelter herself under a huge cotton umbrella, to join him in his sport.

The little woman clung valiantly to her umbrella, and crossing the street in safety, stopped before a shop window and feasted her eyes upon the bargains displayed in its electric-lighted depths.

For some time she gazed, and mentally calculated how far her meager store of Christmas money, hoarded since early in September, would go.

It was cheap stuff that the window displayed, and yet what joy it would bring to the hearts of her children, for childhood never reckons the cost.

Having feasted her eyes, she snapped shut the big umbrella, hurried into the imposing entrance, and down the aisles arched with Christmas greenery, to the elevator which brought her to the toy department.

Reaching the counter she was in search of, she examined the dolls displayed there, and selecting two, she sought her purse.

Into her pocket she thrust her hand, and it came out empty. Startled, she gazed about terrorized, then wailed:

"I've been robbed! I've been robbed! Or else I lost my pocketbook!"

A little group formed about the distressed woman, then a floor-walker made his way through the little knot. He listened to the woman's tale, then politely told her to go to the "Lost and Found" Department, and enquire whether the purse had been found. If not, she would be given carfare to take her home.

With a look of wildest despair, she followed his instructions, received the car-fare, then left the store and plunged into the maddened, snow-swept night, her heart leaden.

She boarded a street car, and rode, on and on, until the vehicle reached a sparsely populated neighborhood where her humble home was. Already great drifts of snow were piled upon the sidewalks, not a step broke the virgin whiteness.

But the sad-eyed little woman minded not the drifts. Her thoughts were upon the children, the disappointed children, to whom she had promised a Christmas of cheer.

Reaching the house, she sank on the stoop, fearing to go in and blast their happiness, for even then she heard indistinct murmurs, and knew they were joyously talking of the event of childhood, Christmas.

CHAPTER II.

A tall man, whose broadness was emphasized by his excessively large and fashionably tailored motor cloak, stepped from a brilliantly lighted restaurant. His face glowed with good nature, and as the blustering wind whirled about him, he threw up his head as if giving his lips to the snow sprites that circled about him.

For a moment or two, he stood at the entrance, then crossed the sidewalk to the curb where stood a snow-frosted limousine.

As he opened the door, he chanced to glance down, and there in the gutter lay a worn, shabby little purse. He leaned down and picked it up. It was a dull leather affair, and its sorry look spoke eloquently of its owner.

"Ye Gods! The first money I've ever gotten without hard work," he smiled, as he tossed it into his pocket. "Perhaps though, it is filled with samples of dress goods."

He glanced about, half expecting to see the distracted owner of the purse appear. But as she did not, he stepped into his limousine and slammed the door.

The chauffeur started off, and Bertram Alvord, illumining the small electric, drew the purse from his pocket and examined his find.

There were no dress goods samples; the purse contained money, sure enough.

Slipping off his gauntlets, he counted the coins, finding that they amounted to $4.46 exactly.

A queer little smile collected at the corners of his mouth as he contemplated the little fortune.

"Someone's Christmas money, I vow. They've lost it and now it means a dark Christmas for them, perhaps.

"I wonder," and he continued his little soliloquy. "I wonder to whom it belongs? Let me see if I can find out," and snapping open another compartment of the purse, he drew forth a rather soiled card with the name "Mrs. Abigail Jones, No. 10801 Michiwaka Street," written upon it in a poor hand, a hand that seemed to tell of its owner's hard acquaintance with the scrub-brush.

"Poor woman," he thought, "I hope she wasn't obliged to walk all the way home. I believe I shall return the purse, and tonight."

With the decision, he gave the address to his chauffeur, bidding him drive there, and turning out the little electric light, he lounged comfortably against the easy seats, watching through dreamy, half-closed eyes, the snow which glinted dazzlingly, as it played about the flaring arc lights.

It was sometime before the machine reached the neighborhood of Michiwaka street, for the wind was furious and the drifts deep, but it finally got there, whereupon, bidding the chauffeur to stop at the corner, for the street on which Mrs. Abigail Jones lived was unpaved and looked particularly antagonistic to motor car tires, Alvord got down and went in search of No. 10801, following a track now almost obliterated which someone had made a little time before.

As he passed his destination, a small woman who was huddled upon the stoop, rose and disappeared into the hall.

"That must be she," he reasoned, and so, when he saw that she had gone, he retraced his steps and soon stood in the dark, damp hall, wherein the wind moaned ghostly and rattled the loose boards.

The partitions were thin, so there in the hall, Alvord stood listening like an eavesdropper, to what went on in the room.

He tried to smile as he heard the sad mother detailing the loss to the disappointed children, and their wails of sorrow tempted him to throw himself into the situation at once.

However, controlling his desire, he stepped from the hall, and prowling about the house, much like a burglar, he sought some means of looking within the room.

He came to the low windows, and then, fortunately, he found the shades did not quite reach the sill, and thus he was given an insight into the room.

Some queer emotion clutched his heart as he gazed upon the room, so clean and neat, but so plain and poor. Then he contemplated the faces of the tear-stained brood of five.

He was about to go into the house, when up rose the eldest of the children, a girl of perhaps fourteen. She was less tear-stained than the rest, and she probably realized her dignity as the oldest child of the family, for now she came forward with a suggestion, and listening with ear pressed against the bit of pasteboard stuck in the corner of the window-pane which was broken, Alvord heard her say:

"Well, mummy, so long as the money's lost, I guess it's gone for good, and that's all there is to it. Now, we'll have our tree, because we've got that already and we can put on colored paper chains, and things like that. And s'long's we won't have no presents, we'll do this: We'll get a lot of boxes and wrap them up nice, and mark them with our names, and what should have been in them. Then we'll put all the wrapped boxes under the tree, and pretend that just what we want is in 'em, and that we got what we wanted. Won't that be swell? We'll have a make-believe Christmas, and that'll be better'n nothing."

Her face glowed with her idea, and the interested look that came into the faces of the others showed that the suggestion was pleasing. The mother was, perforce, obliged to smile comfortingly upon the arrangement, and so, after a time, the little brood grew quite hilarious over the prospect, shouting out in glee what they wanted, "for," as Alvord heard the next oldest say, "s'long's we're just making believe, we can make believe we're getting the swellest lot of things!"

Now he smiled as he saw the hopeful spirit which came upon them.

"Plague the snow! How it stings and makes one's eyes smart!" he exclaimed to himself, as he drew his handkerchief from his pocket. "A pretended Christmas! A Christmas makeshift! Poor kids! Poor kids!"

CHAPTER III.

Christmas Eve!

Alvord stood in his bachelor apartments in the Antler Arms, surrounded by an array of "Christmas truck" that was truly bewildering. For, fearing that he might not get enough, he duplicated and in many instances triplicated his orders, and the result was astonishing.

However, he only smiled as he gazed upon it all, fancying the joy that would be the children's. He had never before interested himself in Christmas charity; all he did was to send a check to the Salvation Army or some other organization, leaving them to use the funds as they thought best. This "stunt" of his, therefore, was novel.

As he checked over the stuff to see if he had the dolls, trumpets, engines, chains, drums and the rest of the things he heard the Jones children speak of, the telephone tinkled.

He took down the receiver, and the voice at the other end of the wire shot a thrill of joy through his being, for it was the voice of Leslie Carrington, Leslie, blue-eyed, slender and dashing, whose face was inspiration, and whose presence was heaven itself.

He listened to the words she spoke, and drank in her voice like a man athirst. Would he come over that evening? No, she had it open as she didn't like any of the affairs scheduled for the night, and so didn't accept any invitation and now she was alone and a bit lonesome.

What young man would refuse an invitation to call upon Leslie? Not one would, and certainly not Bertram Alvord, and it was not long before he had put on fresh linen, changed his suit, and ordering the chauffeur to carry all the bundles to the limousine, which was presently done, he went down-stairs, entered the car, and was on his way.

Leslie was all ready to meet him. She wore a loose house gown, all fluffs and softness, and sweeping, graceful lines. The magic of her presence and the feel of her soft hand in his made him wonder if, indeed, he were not in a dream. For it was seldom that he was alone with Leslie; she was always surrounded, and then too, while she was always kind, it was that kindness which always makes a fellow feel he hasn't a chance.

Pleasantly the evening passed, all too quickly, and it seemed but a few moments when the clock chimed eleven.

"I'm afraid I shall have to go, though I should dearly love to stay a while longer, for tomorrow is Christmas, and you've been unusually kind. I cannot thank you enough for this splendid gift—I mean this evening spent with you. I've been bold enough to order flowers sent to you tomorrow. I wouldn't mention the fact, and only do because I want you to give them more than a passing glance, won't you, please?" he pleaded.

"Indeed, I shall, Bertram. But won't you stay a bit longer? It isn't very late, and being a child no longer, I don't get up at four o'clock Christmas morning."

"I should dearly love to, were it not that I have another engagement to fulfill this night."

She looked inquiringly at him. "So late?"

"Yes."

"I'm rather curious to know what this other engagement is. Can't I know?"

He smiled quizzically, though perhaps a bit shamfacedly.

"Why surely you can know; it isn't dreadful, only perhaps a little silly. I intend to make a pretended Christmas real."

"You are going to make a pretended Christmas real? What do you mean?"

"Just this: The evening before last, I was downtown and found a purse in the gutter. I wondered who had lost their Christmas money—the purse contained exactly $4.46 all in coin—when lo! looking into another compartment of the purse, I found the address of the woman who lost it. She lived in a poor, rickety little building on the outskirts of the town, and as I prowled around, wishing to be sure I was right, I heard the pitiful little tale of the lost purse, the precious purse containing the poor little horde which stinting had gotten together for Christmas. And now the purse was gone! Lost! Why, child," and Alvord grew so interested in his topic that he forgot he was talking to Leslie Carrington, society belle and heiress, and called her "child" with a most endearing expression, "it was worse than a cyclone! And then as the tragedy which had crushed them, eased its strangling hold, the eldest of the group came forward with the most original suggestion for Christmas. Since they couldn't have presents, she suggested that they get all sorts and sizes of boxes, wrap them up neatly, label them as belonging to the different ones, and pretend that the empty boxes contained the things they desired. And they seized upon the idea until they grew cheerful again. Wasn't that comical?" and Alvord did wink hard.

"Why, it was too pretty!" Leslie exclaimed, and the eyes which ever changed in expression now grew soft and lustrous as she gazed upon the man's enthusiastic face. "But what about the pretended Christmas being made real? You intend——"

"Yes, Leslie," for she had stopped in a manner that bade him finish her thought, "I intend to go there tonight, climb in at one of the windows, if possible, and fill those boxes with the presents the children wanted. I've purchased a great lot of Christmas truck which I have out in my limousine. That's why, Leslie, I must leave now, for it will take half the night before I get through."

"Why, how delightful! I wish I could go!"

"Do you? Would you—dare to come with me?"

"If you'll take me and I won't be in the way!"

"Well, I should say, that you would not be. But are you really in earnest?"

"Indeed, yes. Just a moment. I'll have to dress. It won't take long."

She fled up-stairs, and it was not long ere she was down again, warmly clad in furs, and then as they left the house and went down the frosted stairway before the mansion, she leaned upon him so dependently that his heart sang, even though he knew that it was for that night only that he interested her.

They reached the limousine and he pushed the bundles to one side. As the girl stepped into the car, a package tumbled to the floor. He caught it up.

"Heaven! It's a 'choo choo'! Don't step on that!" and he got in beside her, and off they went.

"Who is it for?" she asked, as they rolled along.

"I intend it for the black-eyed little rascal that I saw there, 'coo cooing' with blocks of kindling," he laughed.

After some miles of driving, the limousine slowed down, and the chauffeur announced the arrival at their destination.

Descending, they started for the house, Alvord carrying the packages.

"Give me some too, Bertram," the girl said. "We are spirits of Christmas, and I must have bundles too," and she took several from his arms.

"How shall we get into the house?" she asked, as they neared it.

"Why," he returned, "there's a window conveniently close to the ground, and no lock on it. I'll crawl in through that."

"Suppose they shoot you?" she queried with a little shudder.

"I guess they won't. People ought to be cautious about shooting, even when someone crawls unbidden into their homes tonight. For it is Christmas eve and the time of good will among men. I'll take a chance."

With which words, he directed his steps to the window in question, in which a rather sorry little holly wreath hung, and after a little forcing, the window yielded to his exertions.

It raised, Alvord let himself in; the big packages came next. Then taking a chair, he put it outside the window. The girl mounted it, and then taking her into his arms, he lifted her into the room, a little breathless, but delighted.

"Oh, Bert, isn't this too exhilarating for anything?" she exclaimed.

"Isn't it?" he answered, his voice low and wildly joyous, "but hush, we can't make much noise, or we'll be discoverd. Now then!"

With that, he lifted a package to the table, and stripping the strings from it, its offering was brought to light. Leslie spied the little tree in the corner and going to it, she brought the carefully tied, empty boxes to the table.

"There's plenty of boxes, that's one good thing," she laughed softly, "and you surely have plenty to fill them all. Give me a doll for this box. It is surely a mercy that they got such large boxes, for the dolls would never have fit, otherwise."

"In the Land of Pretension, you can dream as extravagantly as you like," he answered, as he untied the doll, chained by her neck to her prison.

And so, busily they worked, piling the papers into the box in which a large toy had come, crackling them louder than they thought, and laughing now and then without caution.

So engrossed did they become, that they did not see a door behind them swing open, and a woman in a faded wrapper, gazing with frightened eyes upon them. Nor did they see the look of understanding that came to those eyes as they beheld the work of the nocturnal couple, and the tears which welled up to those same tired eyes, as the door was softly pulled to again.

"Now then," said Alvord, "the last thing is to return the pocketbook with the Christmas money," and from his own pocket he took the worn purse, and his own. From the latter, he took several bills which he crushed into the faded little pocketbook, and then placed it atop the package of oat-meal laid out for the morning's breakfast.

"Won't the dears be happy when they find a real Christmas substituted for their pretended one?" laughed Leslie tenderly, as Alvord picked up her furs which she had cast aside, and held them for her to put on.

As she slipped her arms into the fur coat, somehow it was so convenient and so tempting an opportunity to slip his arms about her, and then as he felt the nearness and enchantment of her being, as once before he had felt it that evening, discretion was discarded, and he kissed her.

Then, amazed at his temerity, he looked fearfully upon her.

But Leslie was smiling. "Why are you so frightened?" she queried, taking his hand in hers.

"Why am I so frightened?" he asked, his voice somewhat choked. "Why? Because I was afraid I might have displeased you, doing what I've done. But I haven't have I, Leslie? Have I a chance? I've loved you dear, and wanted you, oh, so much. Even as these children did, I, when alone in my bachelor apartments pretended that you were near me, near where my eyes could ever see you, where I could call you to my side whenever I wanted you. But Leslie, I was only one among many, and had no special talent to offer. Ah, dear, have I really a chance?"

"You dear boy," she murmured, "you have the biggest chance because you never forced yourself upon my attention. You always took what little encouragement I gave you, in a way that won me. And now tonight, performing this little act which other men might have scorned doing, has completely won me. My dreamer! Do you wish me to make your dreams real, even as you've made these children's Christmas real?"

"Do I?" he breathed. "do I? Well, I rather think I do! Oh, Leslie! My dream girl, no longer a pretense!"

His arms closed about her, and they stood lost in their happiness, heart to heart, his lips on hers.

At length, he gently released her from his ardent clasp, then softly they stole away, as spirits should—through the window!

The woman, who had watched the kind deeds of these living Christmas spirits, from behind the door, turned away as she saw them pledge their love.

Now that they were gone, she dropped to her knees.

"O God," she cried, "Thou knowest what is in my heart! Thou knowest what I would say! Fulfill, I pray, all those hopes that tonight have been born in the hearts of these, who in their fortune, have not forgotten the poor."

She rose to her feet, her eyes shining. Going to the stove, she lit the fire, and then illumined the little Christmas tree.

These things finished, she hurried to one bedroom and then to the other.

"Children! Children! Children! It's Christmas morning!"

who wink their eyes and giggle with glee to see what an idiot he is making of himself and what a blessed good thing he is doing for them, and what a black eye he is giving himself, or else he goes and votes for Mr. Belmont or Mr. Ryan, and the wealthy interests back of the democratic party who also giggle with delight at the way he is boosting them, using his political razor to cut his own throat. But some people, not all, learn by experience. Your ignorant voter won't always be ignorant, but he would be if you didn't let him vote, and let me tell you right now, when it comes to voting for the two old parties, a blind mule could do that job just as well as a college professor. The difference between the old parties is just as distinguishable as the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. There is one point however, we must not forget; if a man is ignorant he will be a long time getting wise to the fact that tweedledum and tweedledee are both political highwaymen out for the dust and especially the dust he has got in his pockets. The educated man however, can if he wants to (and he usually doesn't want to), study party platforms, and he could, if he desired, by study and thought, put his brains and energies toward forming some party that would help him, instead of voting for parties that exploit him, and that is something more than the uneducated man is likely to do. If you once began discriminating against the poor and uneducated voter, and allowed only the educated to vote, it would not be long before there would be another division, the highly educated would begin weeding out the poorly educated, and soon the only people in the country that would be allowed to vote would be the graduates of a few of our great universities, and maybe at the finish, Yale and Harvard would cut out all the other seats of learning and would finally throw dice or fight it out amongst themselves as to who should be elected President. If Yale won you'd have another dose of Taft, if Harvard won you'd have another dose of Theodore, the gentleman with the fierce teeth. You see it's very dangerous to monkey with the political buzz saw, for there are a lot of very powerful and unscrupulous people ever ready to limit the privileges and liberties of the masses. Another thing, it is not right to punish a man because he is ignorant. People are bound to be ignorant, tens of thousands of them, under a system that gives all the dollars to the few, and a scattering of pennies to the many. We are supposed to have a wonderful educational system, and probably in the January issue, I'll tell you how wonderful it is—not. When I tell you all about your educational system you will know that if we have educational qualifications for voting there won't be more than one person in a hundred that will be capable of casting a vote, for this nation of ours is not an educated nation by any means, but an intensely ignorant one. Our schools do not turn out educated children, they only turn out incompetents. If a person learns anything that is really worth while today, it is more by home study and observation than by anything the schools have done for him. Do you think if we had an educated nation we would have a Tammany Hall in New York and be ruled by low-browed, ignorant political bosses, ward heelers and crooks? But there are different kinds and degrees of ignorance. The majority of educated people are as politically blind and ignorant as the most benighted boob who ever spoiled a ballot slip. We have whole vast sections of the country where both educated and ignorant are voting either the democratic or republican tickets because of old, dead, decayed, ossified, worn-out, threadbare, issues that can be traced to the unpleasantness of "de wah time." These issues have been handed down from father to son. They are a preposterous obsession with millions who constitute an insurmountable barrier in the way of national progress. Put a mule in the White House and call it a democrat and the South would vote for it. Put a chimpanzee up for President on the republican ticket and the North would vote for it. To hear the democrats prate about Jefferson and the party of Cannon, Depew and Guggenheim, screaming about glorious Lincoln, gives a thoughtful man an awful pain. It is sinful to see these two old predatory parties juggling the reputations of these glorious men and using them for the cheapest political purposes. Though Lincoln and Jefferson have long been dead the ideas and ideals of these great men are fifty years ahead of these hoggish, greedy, stupid times and parties. We certainly do need educational qualifications for voting, but only as a means by which men can be made to vote more intelligently and to vote for truly national interests and not narrow sectional interests, but we don't need educational qualifications for voting as a slick, subtle means of depriving poor devils, who through the economic stress, have been robbed of knowledge and culture, and who are to be punished and disfranchised because an uncivilized system of society has deprived them of the opportunities of ac-

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for the Coming Season

By Geneva Gladding

CHILL autumn days will bring out all the new things in coat suits, coats and other top garments.

She, who is a woman of fashionable taste, may choose between the quaint basque styles, the redingote coat suit, and the neat, trim ever popular one-piece gowns, with or without tunic or flounce effects.

The new styles lend themselves readily for remodelling, especially in the tunic, yoke and vest formations, in which materials may be combined.

There is no style so popular as the tailored shirt-waist. It is shown with paneled fronts, with yoke effects, and tuck groups, also with comfortable raglan sleeve and deep armscyes, with the lovely long shoulder.

For separate skirts, the flounce effects seem to rival the tunics, and many models show plaited inserts, to simulate greater width for the skirts.

Capes and cape wraps are extremely stylish, not only for women, but also for misses and children.

A most splendid variety is met with in children's dresses; there are dresses with double skirts, some in tunic style, vest and yoke effects, long and raglan shoulders, with set-in sleeves.

In boys' suits there are the new jackets with vest and Dickens' collar, the belted coat with yoke back, and the new, straight trousers.

The simple styles are always preferred by practical mothers, and the present fashion of front closing on girls' dresses is a great convenience.

Our special article, in this issue, describing The Cotton Style Show will be found of interest inasmuch as it is a step in the right direction and tends to decrease rather than increase the cost of dressing, and at the same time tends to help the home industries which are overstocked with cotton, owing to the war. Many of the patterns shown here can be developed in cotton as well as in the materials given.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

9775—Boys' Overcoat with yoke back. Chinchilla, cheviot, wool mixtures, serge or corduroy are suitable materials for this style of garment. The back is plaited below a square yoke.

Cut in five sizes; three, five, six, eight and 10 years. It requires two and one half yards of 54-inch material for a five-year size.

1058—Costume for Misses and Small Women with long or short sleeve. This dress is made with regulation waistline, and has a long tunic, the front of which is cut in one with a vest portion to which the waist fronts are joined. The pattern is good for velvet, corduroy, silk, charmeuse, crepe, broadcloth, voile or cashmere.

Cut in four sizes; 14, 16, 17 and 18 years. It requires five and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for a 17-year size.

8628—Doll's Middy Suit, with Military Cape and cap. The design submitted shows the popular "middy" blouse, a jaunty cap, and a stylish military cape. All of these models are simple and easy to make so that even "little mothers" could attempt to develop them. Wash or woolen goods may be used for the suit, while broadcloth, silk or velvet are suitable for the cape.

Cut in three sizes, for dolls 18, 20 and 22 inches in height. It requires three eighths yard for the cap, one and three quarters yards for the suit and seven eighths yard for the cape of 27-inch material.

1060—Child's Dress, with long or short sleeves and in Empire style or loose. Dimity, lawn, crossbar muslin, nainsook, batiste, mull or silk may be used. The sleeve is in raglan style, affording comfort and ease to the arm and shoulder.

Cut in four sizes; six months, one, two and four years. It requires two and one half yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1084—Costume for Ladies and Misses. This stylish model shows a combination of Roman striped silk and blue serge. It is unique and attractive, and will lend itself appropriately to combinations in other materials. The dress may be finished without the tunic, or made with tunic gathered at the waist, or joined to the yoke. The neck finish too offers variety, either in the broad collar or the flare.

Cut in four sizes: for misses, 14, 16, 17, and 18 years, and six sizes for ladies; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six yards of 44-inch material for a 14-year size, and six and one half yards for a 36-inch size.

8433—A Comfortable, Desirable and Convenient Creeper or Romper Dress. The model here shown covers every requirement of a creeping apron or pinafore, and serves as rompers also. It may also be used as a sleeping garment and will as such be very practical. Gingham, flannelette, chambrey, cambric or domet flannel may be used for its development.

Cut in three sizes; six months, one and two years.

1072—A Comfortable and Pretty Dress for Mother's Girl. This dress may be fashioned with long or short sleeves. The yoke portions are cut in one with the sleeve, and meet the fronts at the vest joining. The pattern provides a lining. This style is good for gingham, galatea, chambrey, serge, voile, panama, cashmere or silk.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years, and requires four and one eighth yards of 40-inch material for a 12-year size.

1077—Ladies' Waist, with Vest and Body Lining. This attractive design embodies some new style features. The long sleeve with shaped cuff, and the girdle are most becoming. The design is good for silk, velvet, voile, crepe, madras, linen or batiste.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires two and five eighths yards of 40-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1011—Ladies' Kimono. The waist is cut in Empire style, with skirt attached having a wide panel over the back. The pattern is good for flannelette, lawn, crepe, percale, dimity, batiste, cashmere or silk.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1095—Ladies' Dressing Sack or Kimono. The model is cut with body and sleeve in one. It is comfortable and pleasing. The style is good for batiste, cashmere, voile, crepe, lawn, organdie or silk.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1116—Girls' Dress with or without girdle. Checked suiting or plaid woolens are good for this style. If made of wash materials, there are strong serviceable galateas in plain and striped materials. Devonshire cloth in neat checks, percales in lovely pattern, and seersuckers that require no ironing. The dress shows real "grown-up" style features in its flare collar and smart girdle. The skirt has a lap tuck at the center back.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires four yards of 40-inch material for a 14-year size.

9603—Ladies' Night Gown with long or shorter sleeve, and with or without added yoke. This design is cut on simple, comfortable lines, and may be made in sack length or regulation gown length. The model is suitable for muslin, cambric, lawn, nainsook, crepe, batiste, flannel, flannelette or silk.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for the gown in full length, and four yards for sack length for a 36-inch size.

1056—Ladies' Apron. This simple but practical model, is good for gingham, percale, lawn, mohair, drill, or alpaca. The design has a panel front, with side and back portions cut in one.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1100—Ladies' Slip, Combination Corset Cover in Basque Style, and Skirt with Ruffle. This garment is good for silk, cambric, muslin, nainsook, batiste, crossbar muslin, or crepe. The ruffle may be of material, of lace edging, or embroidery.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires four and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1110—Girls' Over-blouse Dress with Guimpe, sleeve in either of two lengths. Plaid woolen in soft brown tones combined with tan cashmere is here portrayed. The design would develop well in other combinations.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two and three eighths yards of 40-inch material with one and seven eighths yard for the guimpe for an eight-year size.

9766—Dolls' Set, comprising a Balkan Dress, a Coat and a "Billie Burke" Bonnet. The styles here shown are easily developed, and suitable for any of the dainty materials used for doll's clothing. Cloth, silk, or velvet may serve for either coat and dress, and for the latter, linen, linene, lawn, or percale is also appropriate. The bonnet could be of lawn, silk, plush or velvet as desired. The pattern includes all styles illustrated.

Cut in six sizes; for dolls, 14, 16, 18, 20, 22 and 24 inches in heighth. It requires one half yard of 24-inch material for the cap, one and one half yard for the dress, and one and three eighths yard for the coat for an 18-inch size.

1093—Girls' Coat. This attractive style has a waist front, lengthened by a skirt portion, that is joined to the waist under a broad belt. The design is good for broadcloth, serge, novelty cloakings, velvet and corduroy.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires four yards of 40-inch material for a 12-year size.

1087—Ladies' Apron. Percale, gingham, lawn, seersucker, denim and alpaca are suitable for this design. It is fitted with shoulder and underarm seams.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1107—Ladies' House Dress with Reversible Closing. How very practical and easy to adjust is this model. No buttons or hooks and eyes over the fronts; just a simple crossing of these parts, and a fastening at the back. This model is good for percale, gingham, lawn, drill, linene, seersucker, or galatea.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1112—An Ever Popular Suit for Our Boy. This trim little model is easily developed and if made of warm winter suiting will be very fine for cold weather. This model is good for flannel, cheviot, serge, velvet, corduroy, linen, galatea or seersucker. If made of fine ribbed serge in a nice shade of blue or brown, with a black tie, and patent leather belt with self covered buttons, this style will surely please the "little man."

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires three yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

1114—Ladies' House or Home Dress. The waist is made with a group of tucks over the bust. The raglan sleeve, such a comfortable sleeve, may be finished in wrist or elbow length. The skirt is a three-piece model with plaited fullness at the back. Blue gingham, with collar and cuffs of white pique would be nice for this style, or gray and white seersucker, with trimming in self or contrasting color.

Cut in five sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust measure. It requires six yards of 40-inch material for a 38-inch size.

1068—Girls' Apron with long or shorter sleeve, and with collar or "V" neck edge. This model completely covers the dress, and may serve as a little play dress or "pinafore." It is suitable for cambric, percale, gingham or chambrey.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 27-inch material for a six-year size.

1102—Ladies' House Dress with long or short sleeves. The model is good for seersucker, lawn, gingham, chambrey, cashmere or linene. The waist is made with open neck, and finished with revers, facings, that meet a shaped round collar.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

Fresh-water Pearls

ALTHOUGH fresh-water pearls do not command such high prices as those derived from the pearl oysters that grow in the ocean, nevertheless pearl fishing in the rivers of the United States means a good many thousands of dollars added to the wealth of the country, not to mention the value of the buttons made out of the mussel shells from which the pearls come. In prehistoric times pearls were found in the rivers of what is now America and from one mound of the Mound Builders in the Little Miami Valley in Ohio, 60,000 pearls were found by two American professors who were excavating. Age and mould had ruined them, but they were there just the same. When De Soto and his early Spaniards were seeking Indian gold they found 350 pounds of pearls in Indian sepulchres which were of value. The year 1857 may be said to be discovery year for present day American pearls, one weighing 93 grains, becoming famous later as the "Queen," being found near Patterson, N. J. This is now owned by some of the royalty of Europe. In 1876 pearls were found in Ohio and in 1880 they were found in Tennessee. In 1889 some of the finest ever found in this country were discovered in Wisconsin creeks and rivers and in 1897 the Black and White rivers in Arkansas brought forth many fine ones. Probably the finest two are the Queen Mary, weighing 208 grains from Iowa, and the Light of Morn from Arkansas, equally notable. The U. S. Bureau of Fisheries has established a pearl and button industry at Fairport, Iowa, on the Mississippi river and there the most systematic and scientific development of American pearls may be studied. Discoveries in other parts of the country are being made every year and if the people in various localities went about the work with intelligence and system, they might find it productive, though there is no fortune in it for anybody. But they must know what they are about and must do their work with perseverance. Information on the subject may be had by writing to the Bureau of Fisheries, Washington, D. C. and if any of you people have any pearls that you have found, you may be able to dispose of them by writing to Eugene A. Kohut, 65 Nassau St., New York, who is a commercial authority. But you mustn't think you have a fortune in a pearl, even if it is as big as a walnut, because it may have flaws in it, or lack luster or have some other defect that may reduce its value to little or nothing, and even if it is perfect it has no such value as sea pearls, the highest priced fresh-water pearl so far found being worth less than two thousand dollars. Very small ones are of no value at all, and one to be worth ten dollars must be above the average. There is really more money in selling the shells for making buttons, but this calls for quantity, as shells are worth only from eighteen dollars a ton, up, and it takes an awful lot of wading and dredging to get a ton of mussel shells in most of our rivers, though in the Mississippi river in Iowa a lot of people make a living at it, three or four hundred pounds of shells a day being the average. But write to the Bureau of Fisheries and get information before you go pearl fishing.

A Thorn Among Roses

He informed Will, in a casual way at lunch, that he had received a telegram from his guardian, who stated that he would return earlier than he expected, being called home by some unlooked-for business.

Will also mentioned the fact to Alice that same evening, whereupon she inquired if Mrs. Ingraham and Olive were expected at the same time.

He replied that he thought not, and later the young girl, by adroitly questioning him, obtained their address, and the next morning posted the letter—which had so strangely come into her possession—to Imogen.

Mr. Fletcher arrived on the morning of the twenty-third, and was most heartily welcomed by both Will and the judge. Not knowing that Will was all in the dark regarding the "secret," he exclaimed, as he shook hands with him:

"Will, my boy, things are being reversed somewhat. I was contemplating sending for you to join me in Paris, to take a little run into Switzerland, when I received the judge's telegram. What is this wonderful revelation in connection with yourself?"

A look of blank astonishment swept over Will's face.

"Revelation! What do you mean, Uncle Roland? I am sure I have heard of nothing wonderful about myself," he replied, while he regarded the judge in perplexity.

Mr. Fletcher laughed as he caught sight of the look of dismay upon his father-in-law's face, for the man had contemplated having a private conversation with him before saying anything to Will.

"Will," he said, "I find that I have been somewhat premature; but since you are a young man of good sense and discretion, I do not believe that I have done any material harm."

Will glanced from one to the other with a sense of embarrassment.

"I am still in the dark," he smilingly observed.

"Well, you shall be enlightened," the judge here interposed. "I did intend to talk with Roland first; but, perhaps, after all, it will simplify matters if we take you at once into the secret. I have recently made a very important discovery regarding your birth."

Both his listeners started at this unexpected intelligence. Roland Fletcher flushing and Will growing pale in view of what might be coming.

"Well, this is a surprise, truly," Mr. Fletcher observed, adding: "But go on—pray do not keep us in suspense."

Accordingly, Judge Ashburton at once proceeded to relate the remarkable story which Sir Arthur Stamford had told him three days previous, while his companions sat as if spellbound during the recital.

Will's look and attitude had at first been anxious and dejected; for, as we know, he had always been very sensitive regarding his origin; but as the judge unfolded the romantic tale his eye grew bright, he sat erect and alert, and before his friend concluded his whole bearing plainly testified to the joy that thrilled him.

His face grew sad, however, and tears more than once sprang to his eyes as he listened to the trials of his mother and her grief over the uncertainty of his fate; while a great sense of personal loss came over him upon learning that he could never know, in this life, the sweet woman whom his heart told him he could have worshiped.

Then, farther on, as he began to comprehend all that this revelation meant to him, began to realize how proud was the name and title which he would bear, the exalted position he would occupy, the great wealth he would inherit, he could scarce restrain the exultation he experienced as he thought: "All this I can now bestow upon my darling, who is more than worthy to share these honors that have been thrust upon me."

"Well, Will, my dear boy, this is indeed wonderful and most unexpected!" Mr. Fletcher exclaimed when, at length, all had been told, and there were tears in his own eyes as he spoke.

While he was rejoiced beyond expression over the brilliant prospect before the young man, there came with it, nevertheless, a feeling of sadness that this bright and noble fellow, whom he had reared and loved like an own son, was about to slip away out of his life—in a way—and into separate interests of his own.

"It certainly is, Uncle Roland, and I am afraid I do not realize or appreciate it fully as yet—it almost seems as if I have been listening to an exaggerated story about somebody else," Will rejoined. "And at the same time," he added, with a slight smile, "I am somewhat in awe of the honors which have been so suddenly heaped upon me."

"You will prove yourself equal to them, never fear," said the judge. "I have always been sure that you came of good stock. I have often declared to Roland that you were born to the purple," he concluded, laughing, as he recalled the old prophecy.

"You would not have thought so if you could have seen me the day that Uncle Roland found me—a dirty, ragged, wretched little urchin, the bond-slave of that educator of thieves," responded Will, who found that he could now refer to those old days and experiences without the pang of unutterable shame which he had heretofore suffered. "She was a cruel creature," he added, musingly, "and I never read of a thief that I do not recall the thrashings she used to give me."

"Those thrashings, unmerited though they were, proved to be your salvation, my son," said his guardian, as he regarded him affectionately. "When you told me, with your great, hollow eyes fixed pathetically upon my face, how she whipped you, but that you'd 'rather take the lickin' than swipe,' I made up my mind that I had found—as someone has poetically expressed it—'a star in a dust heap,' or, at least, one that was entirely out of its orbit. That has been proven, over and over, during the years that you have been with me, and now I am unutterably glad that the mystery of your origin has been explained and you will take your rightful place in the world."

"But you will still be—Uncle Roland," said Will, smiling, but with a suspicious quiver of his manly chin.

"I am sure I shall be proud to be so regarded, dear boy," was the hearty response. "And now," he added, briskly, to cover the huskiness that had crept into his voice, "We must go at once to confer with Sir Arthur Stamford, for these are matters which must be settled without delay."

Accordingly, after lunch the three gentlemen drove to Stamford Court, which was located about five miles from Windsor, and where the baronet received them most cordially.

Here a long and interesting conference was held, during which Will's baptismal certificate was produced, also the one confirming the marriage of Mabel Randal Curtis, of New York, to William Marchmont, of England. The name of the maid, Maggie McNeil, which Mr. Fletcher had written in a memorandum book, was found to correspond with the name of Miss Curtis' maid, which was also in Sir Arthur's possession.

Will was told many interesting things about his mother, and shown a portrait, which had been painted only a year previous to her death; and as he stood before it, studying the lovely features, everyone in the room could trace a strong resemblance in his own face to the one looking down from the canvas upon him.

Young Arthur Stamford sought him, a little later, and grasped his hand fraternally, even though he knew him to be the successful suitor for the hand of the woman whom he loved.

"I feel that we are almost brothers," he said, "for I owe more than I can ever express to the dear woman whom I loved as a mother—my own having been taken when I was too young to realize my loss, I feel almost guilty to have been the recipient of such love and care as she lavished upon me, knowing that you—her son—were deprived of her ministrations. I am sure, however, that the knowledge of this will be a bond of friendship between us as long as we both live."

"Indeed it will," Will earnestly replied, and all their lives they maintained a truly brotherly regard for each other.

CHAPTER IX.

"AT REST AT LAST."

Before the party returned to Castleview, a day was set for them to pay a visit to Lady Marchmont, Marquise of Leith. Meantime, Sir Arthur said he would communicate with her ladyship by letter giving her a full account of what had been revealed regarding Will and his relationship to her.

Pending their visit to Marchmont Court, however, it was deemed best to say nothing to anyone regarding their discoveries, lest something unforeseen should arise to complicate matters. It was a warm but lovely morning during the last week in July, when the four gentlemen repaired to the ancestral home of the lords of Leith, which was located some eighteen miles from Castleview.

As the party approached it they marveled at the extent and beauty of the estate.

It was situated in Surrey county, and embraced many hundreds of acres of forest, meadow and upland.

The great mansion, which stood in the midst of an immense lawn, covering fully fifty acres that were ornamented with grand old trees, choice shrubbery, fountains and beautiful gardens, was a massive stone structure three stories high, having a length of at least two hundred feet and a depth of, perhaps, seventy-five, while its high gables and numerous handsome facades made it a most imposing as well as a picturesque feature of the landscape.

It faced the south, and a wide, smooth, semi-circular avenue swept up a rise of ground from the highway to the magnificent porte-cochere at one of its several entrances.

The stone, of which the dwelling was built, and which was almost flawless granite, had been quarried from "Leith Hill," a striking feature of the landscape which could be seen in the distance and which formed a fine and rugged background for the picture.

As the guests drove to the door, a grave and dignified butler stood there to admit them and ushered them into the great hall—a large, square room, finished in oak, most luxuriously furnished, its most prominent feature being an immense fireplace in the rear, which was ornamented with costly tiles and surmounted by an elaborately carved mantle and mirror.

Thence they were led into a reception room on the right—an apartment hung with choice tapestries and quaintly furnished in a style representing the previous century, and every article in it worth almost its weight in gold; while the pictures on the walls were, everyone, from the hand of a master.

After receiving the visitors' cards upon a golden salver, the butler disappeared, and, fifteen minutes later, a woman of grand and noble presence entered the room.

She was, apparently, about sixty-five years of age, tall and majestic in figure, with a delicate, high-bred face surmounted by a wealth of snow-white hair most carefully arranged. Her eyes were dark gray, kind in expression, but with a look in their depths which told of sorrow and disappointment, of anticipations unfulfilled and bright hopes crushed; while about her mouth there were lines of patient sweetness that instantly attracted one to her.

Her manner was calm and self possessed, gracious and winning, and one instinctively felt that no matter what the emergency she might be called upon to face, there was character and reserve force to meet it unflinchingly.

She was dressed in a richly brocaded satin of lavender hue, beautifully trimmed with finest of thread lace. A magnificent diamond brooch gleamed at her throat, costly solitaires in her ears and gems of various colors on her fingers.

She greeted Sir Arthur Stamford with undisguised pleasure, her face lighting with a rare, sweet smile as she shook his hand. He presented her to Judge Ashburton, Mr. Fletcher and Will in turn.

She welcomed the elder gentlemen most graciously while her clear eyes searched their faces with a look that seemed to read their inmost thoughts.

But when she came to Will she betrayed signs of deep emotion. Her lips quivered and tears sprang to her eyes.

"So you are the young man who bears the name of my dear son," she said, as she clasped his hand in both of hers, while she studied his features with a yearning intentness that told its own tale of sorrow and heart-hunger.

He bore her gaze well, returning it with one of reverent respect, and seemed to feel his soul going out to meet hers in mutual acknowledgment of a kindred tie.

"You do not look like my William," she added, after a moment, with a soft, regretful sigh, "except, perhaps, in the shape of your brow and head, though in form you are like him; but your features are like Mabel's—Lady Stamford's, I think"—her eyes lighting with sudden pride and pleasure as she swept his fine, manly form from head to foot. "There can be no doubt that you are her son and my grandson; if your papers prove it I shall be happy indeed."

Will's heart throbbed with grateful emotion at these words, but more especially at the thrill of fond pride and ownership that pervaded them, and he felt as if he could almost worship this beautiful, gracious old lady to whom, he was convinced, he belonged by the closet of kindred ties.

He lifted one of her white, shapely hands and respectfully touched his lip to it.

"Thank you," he said, earnestly, "to make you happy would also make me very glad and proud."

He led her to a great easy-chair that stood in one corner of the room, and where, when she was seated, she looked like a venerable queen upon her throne.

She immediately broached the all-absorbing topic which had brought them there, and which was freely discussed for more than an hour, at the end of which time Lady Marchmont declared herself entirely convinced that Will was the son of her dead soldier boy and Mabel Randal Curtis, whom he had married during his visit to America, nearly twenty-five years previous.

"Of course," she said, in conclusion, "his place, from this time on, is here, at Marchmont Court; the truth must be made public at once and proper steps taken to have him recognized as the Marquis of Leith."

Will flushed with various emotions as she spoke of him thus—by the title which his ancestors had borne.

It actually made him dizzy to think of it—to think that all the fair domain of Leith, as far as the eye could reach, belonged to him—the little beggar who more than twenty years previous Roland Fletcher had rescued from the slums of New York and a bad woman's demoralizing influence; that that magnificent dwelling, with all its rare and costly furnishings, would henceforth be his home. But what thrilled him most was the fact that this grand and beautiful old lady also belonged to him and he to her—that the same blue blood flowed in his veins as in hers—that he had a name and a position all his very own and was no longer a nameless waif dependent upon a good man's generosity, but—a lord in his own right.

"My weary heart is at rest at last, after long years of grief and restless yearning," her ladyship continued, "after harrowing fears that the estate would revert to the crown when I should die, and the name of Marchmont become extinct."

A little later she herself led Will over the great house, while the other gentlemen were discussing some legal points; showing him its treasures, the state apartments and art gallery; pointing out to him from the various windows the beautiful views on every hand and calling his attention to the stables, which, she told, were capable of accommodating at least twenty horses, although she was at present keeping only three for her especial use.

"Of course," she aded, smiling and bestowing a beaming glance upon him, "you must now stock them in a suitable manner and to please yourself. There is plenty of money to enable you to do what you like, for I have not begun to spend the income, and it has been accumulating ever since my husband—your grandfather—died."

The stables would accommodate "twenty horses," and her ladyship was keeping "only three" for her special use! Will would have thought himself rich to have been the owner of even a span of blooded steeds.

It made his head swim when he thought of the affluence and glory which had been thrust upon him so unexpectedly.

When lunch was announced the guests were conducted to the lofty and spacious dining-room, which was finished in quartered oak, richly carved, one entire side of it comprising an immense bay window of plate glass and commanding a fine view of Leith Hill and the intervening landscape. The table was covered with the finest and heaviest of damask, laid with costly cut glass and silver, and a most delicious repast was served by well-trained servants, while her ladyship presided with a dignity and grace which proclaimed her "to the manner born."

When Sir Arthur finally began to talk of returning to Windsor, Lady Marchmont turned quickly to Will, an eager look on her sweet face.

"My son," she said, "your place is here now; you will come to Leith immediately, will you not?"

Will flushed, and involuntarily lifted a questioning glance to Mr. Fletcher.

A sudden sense of loss, a feeling almost of dismay overcome him at the thought of breaking away from and leaving the kind guardian to whom he owed so much—from "Uncle Roland," whom he loved as a father. Truly, greatness had its trials, he thought. The gentleman smiled, although there was a keen pang in his own heart in view of the coming separation.

"Yes, my boy," he said, "your place is here, and it is best that you should assume your new name and position as soon as practicable."

Then he added, a sparkle of mischief in his eye: "A twenty-mile drive is not such a formidable one that you cannot see your old friends as often as you choose. I don't think we shall quite lose sight of you."

After a little further discussion of the subject, it was arranged that Will should, within a few days, take up his permanent abode at Marchmont Court, at least during the remainder of his vacation, for he firmly insisted that he should complete his course at Yale and take his degree, in accordance with his original intention.

Lady Marchmont demurred at this at first. She argued that, having come to his rightful heritage, he should not leave it again to go wandering off to America; that if he must complete his law course, he could easily do it there, under a private tutor.

But Will was respectfully firm.

"I am very sorry if my plan does not meet with your approval," he said, in a tone of deep regret, "but, truly, I should forfeit something of my self-respect, if, after having so nearly completed my course, I should fail to take my degree, for which I have striven so long; while I should surely labor under disadvantages to leave my alma mater and finish my course elsewhere."

"But Marchmont needs you," pleaded her ladyship.

"You have told me that you have a most reliable steward." Will opposed to this argument; "let him manage the estate for one more year, and then I will faithfully devote myself to my duties as the master of Leith."

Lady Marchmont yielded the point gracefully, for she saw that his heart was set upon it; while she also secretly admired him for his firmness in adhering to the course which he had laid down for himself.

The drive back to Windsor was a somewhat silent one, for each was busy with his own thoughts, which, on the part of our Castleview friends, were strongly tinctured with sadness and regret, in view of the approaching separation which would leave a void in their hearts and home at Castleview; while to Will it seemed like being cast off alone at sea, to break away from "Uncle Roland" and start out upon an independent career for himself.

That evening Mr. Fletcher wrote Olive a full account of what had occurred and advised that she return at no very distant day, for Lady Marchmont had confidentially informed him that she contemplated giving a grand reception to Will, before he left England to resume his studies; because she wished him to be publicly recognized as her grandson and the future lord of Leith, and also become acquainted with the people of the county.

After dinner that same night, Will ordered his horse saddled and rode over to Beechcote to confide to his betrothed the great change that had taken place in his life and prospects.

There was a proud light in his eyes and a tender smile upon his lips, for he was thinking what a charming mistress Alice would make for Marchmont Court, and how he should love to see her in silks, laces and diamonds and with all the accessories of wealth about her.

She heard him approaching and met him on the veranda, as fair a vision as any lover would care to see, clad in her simple white lawn, so daintily made, with only a blue silken girdle and a knot of the same color in her golden hair, for ornament.

"I wondered if you would get back in season to come tonight," she said, as she lifted her red lips to receive his usual greeting. "Did you have a good day?"

"Yes, a very good day—a 'red-letter day,' and one that has been fraught with a remarkable experience. Shall I tell you about it, dear?" Will responded, as he drew her to a seat and sat down beside her.

"Yes, if you like—you know that whatever concerns you, interests me," Alice observed, as she confidingly slipped her hand into his.

"I told you that I was to be away on business," said her lover. "I have been with Judge Ashburton and Uncle Roland to visit the Marquise of Leith."

"And who is the Marquise of Leith?" inquired Alice. "I think I have never heard of her."

"She is otherwise known as Lady Marchmont."

"Lady Marchmont!" repeated the fair girl with a slight start.

"Why! the name is the same as yours!"

"Yes, sweetheart, and now prepare yourself for some wonderful news—she is also my grandmother."

"Will!—the Marquise of Leith your grandmother! I did not suppose you had a relative in the world—you have told me——"

"Yes, dear I know I have told you that I had no kindred ties; I have told you all the story of my wretched childhood, how Mr. Fletcher found me in the slums of New York and rescued me, giving me the place of a son in his heart and home. But, within a few days, very startling discoveries have been made, which have led to the revelation that my father was the son of the late Lord Marchmont of Leith. Now, listen, and I will tell you the whole story from beginning to end."

And he forthwith proceeded to do so, the fair girl sitting almost breathless beside him, never once interrupting him, but growing strangely cold and numb, a sense of desolation and despair settling down upon her and driving every atom of color from her face and freezing the heart within her.

"Now, tell me sweet, is it not the most wonderful story you ever heard?" Will demanded in an eager tone, after giving her all the details and a description of his visit to Leith—of the grand ancestral home of the Marchmonts and of the beautiful and stately woman with whom he was henceforth to live.

"It is, indeed, very wonderful," Alice replied, in a tone of constraint, as she gently released her icy fingers from his clasp, when her hand fell a dead weight at her side.

"And are you not glad for me, dear?" he questioned, bending close to her until his lips touched

The Feeding and Care of Breeding Stock

THE year is drawing to a close, and we should soon be devoting our thoughts to improving things for the coming season. Usually, every flock needs some working up and improving if the best results are to be realized.

First of all, I want to call your attention to several points which are not usually well defined in amateur poultry keepers' minds. First comes the feeding of hens which are expected to produce eggs in quantities during the winter. You know by many of our past talks that they require rich, forcing food, but what many of you don't realize is that the hens which have been picked out to go into the breeding pens next spring, must not be forced. If a hen should receive the same rich food all through the winter that is given to laying hens, she would join forces with them and produce quantities of eggs, but when it came to putting her into a breeding pen with a male bird in the spring, her best productive powers would be on the wane, and in all probability the eggs laid would be infertile, or at best the germs they contained would be weak, wanting in the elements which produce strong, vigorous chicks.

Our plan is to put all pullets into the laying house in their first fall, and use a few trap nests in each house for two or three months, so that we can be sure which are the best layers. From these we select breeding stock and mark them with an extra leg-band, to insure there being no mistake the following spring, when their first season's laying is over and they are about one year old. They are turned out into colony houses given free range. All through the summer they forage for most of their food, only being given oats and wheat at supper-time. This period of rest and exercise builds them up constitutionally, and about the end of September we commence gradually to get them into condition, giving them a little grain at breakfast-time as well as in the evening. With November they start having dinner in the middle of the day—a mash made of equal parts of ground corn, oats, white middlings and bran.

About the end of December they are divided into small flocks of ten, and are put into the breeding-house, which is a long house divided into compartments fifteen by ten feet, with a yard fifteen by twenty feet. A cockerel is put with each flock, and they are fed the same as in November, except that beef scraps are added to the mash; very little at first, and the quantity gradually increased, until by the middle of June a small cupful of scraps is used to every four quarts of mash. The floor of the breeding-house is covered to a depth of six inches with dry leaves or chopped straw. Whole corn mixed with wheat, Kaffir corn and millet, is scattered broadcast about half an hour before dark. The birds rush about and pick up the whole corn, and the smaller grain gets pushed under the litter, so little of it is eaten at night, but when the birds first get off the perch in the morning they go to work scratching and hunting for it, which insures their getting plenty of vigorous exercise to warm up their blood after the long cold night on the perch. This keeps them healthy, and gives them a good appetite. About nine o'clock they have sprouted oats and half a pint of Kaffir corn scattered on the litter. Between one and two o'clock they have their mash, and then supper, as I said, just before dark.

One of the most important things in the care of breeding stock is to keep everything around them scrupulously clean. White diarrhea, and several other germ and microbe diseases which kill off pheasants and baby chicks every year, are bred in mouldy litter and grain. The hens, in scratching and eating such material, become infested with the microbes or germs which eventually become part of the egg, so contaminating the chick even before it breaks out of the shell. I receive hundreds of letters asking how to deal with sickly chicks and chicks pasted up behind and such like troubles, which are all really the direct result of the conditions having surrounded the hens which laid the eggs from which the chicks were hatched. Nearly everyone is careful about baby creatures, but few people, outside of professional poultry keepers, bother about what sort of stuff hens scratch amongst. Don't turn out moudy, decaying potatoes or mouldy bread to hens, for they contain dangerous elements which may cost you many of the chicks you hatch the following spring.

Feeding for Eggs and Preparing Market Stock

This month should also see all the market stock cleared out. For one thing, the demand for table birds is good at this season of the year, and for another thing you want the room they are occupying. Houses for breeding stock should be well cleaned out, and thoroughly disinfected and whitewashed—work that can't be done whilst they are occupied by other birds. Separate the birds to be marketed from the rest of the stock, confine them in a small house for two weeks, and fatten. The results will pay well, I assure you, not only in extra weight, but really plump birds bring more per pound; besides which, people who receive really good fresh birds from you this year will want more in the future. A pleased customer is the best advertisement you can have. To make plump, fresh birds they should be fattened on mash food entirely and given skim-milk to drink. Whole corn is converted almost entirely into internal fat, and what little extra flesh is put on is tough and stringy.

Mash should be made of two parts ground corn, one part barley, and one part white middlings, and be mixed much softer than for laying of breeding stock. If you have skim-milk to spare, scald, and use it for moistening the mash instead of water. This advice applies to ducks and geese just the same, except that they should have some cooked and mashed beets, turnips or small potatoes added to the mash. Unless turkeys have been accustomed to semi-confinement it is not safe to shut them up during the process of fattening, as they will only worry and fidget what flesh there was, off their bones. But you can give them a good mash feed twice a day for two or three weeks. We keep only the White Holland variety, which are very quiet, home-loving birds, and as the old ones are very tame, they bring the youngsters around the house and warm buildings as soon as the insects commence to get scarce in the fall, and when it comes to fattening time we can shut them up in a large yard without their resenting it in any way. It is so much easier to fatten when birds cannot take unlimited exercise.

To capture the best prices, the birds must be properly killed, and look attractive when they go to market. Give nothing to eat for ten to twelve hours before killing, to insure the crop and intestines being empty. Geese and turkeys should be given a sharp blow on the back of the head to stun them, then immediately be hung up by the feet, the beak opened, and a sharp, thin knife used to sever the blood-vessels at the back of the throat as they must bleed quickly and freely. Hook a small weight into the lower bill and keep it open. Dry pick as soon as blood stops, and whilst they are still warm, or the feathers will be hard to pull out and the skin torn, which would, of course, spoil their appearance and detract from their salable value.

Marketing Eggs

Marketing home products advantageously is of paramount importance, and seems to be the point on which many fail. Commission men and wholesale markets should not be resorted to, because home-grown products of all descriptions excel in quality and not in quantity; therefore, appeal to high-class private custom, who desire the very best, regardless of price.

I have never sold through any of the ordinary market channels, yet have always had more orders than I could fill and received a little more than the ordinary prices. Naturally the location of the home and the quality of the wares must influence the returns to some extent, but not half so much as the method of packing and shipping. Nicety in these respects captures the favor of customers and they take pride in exhibiting things to their friends—which is the very best sort of advertising a home business can have.

When I had reached the point where I knew that I could depend on a certain number of eggs regularly, I wrote to a doctor friend in the city and told him that I could promise him to deliver six dozen strictly fresh-laid eggs twice a week for the whole year, at a uniform price of forty-five cents a dozen; customers to pay the express charges, which would be twenty-five cents on each six dozen. (Express companies return empty packages free of charge.) Within a month he had found four customers for me, who would take two dozen a week each, the box to be delivered at his house, where the other three customers were to call every Saturday and Wednesday.

All poultry supply houses have wooden boxes for sale with divided trays, made to hold three, six or twelve dozen eggs, for about two dollars apiece. Before the year was out each of the three other customers had interested one or two friends, with the result that three six-dozen boxes were shipped three time a week, and the following winter I had orders from the same people for butter and table poultry.

In this way my market grew, as did my stock, and I never had any surplus to worry about. Of course, I realize that there was an element of good luck in having a doctor for a friend, but when there is no good Samaritan to start a clientele for you, energy will surely accomplish it; for every housekeeper longs to get good, fresh-delivered table delicacies which have not passed through a dozen hands.

I know one woman who got her first customer by writing personal notes to women of social prominence in a nearby town, whose addresses she got from a directory. From twenty letters she received two replies, but they both became regular customers, and recommended friends.

Another instance of personal effort took the form of calls upon doctors and clergymen. Still another woman interested the fashionable milliner of her town to canvass orders among her customers, and paid for the favor with eggs and butter.

A more impersonal way of gaining customers would be to arrange with one or two well located drug-stores or stationery stores for the display of large cards bearing notices of the things for sale and your address; but of course, there are dozens of ways to find customers. Advertising in newspapers will do as a last resource, but strictly personal methods are the best.

Now about packing. Eggs should never be more than two days old, and must be sorted into lots of uniform color and size. If the eggs should become soiled in muddy weather, wipe them with a damp cloth as soon as gathered, so that the shell does not become permanently stained.

Don't let anything interfere with the arranged schedule for shipping. Gain a uniform reputation or excellence and punctuality, and success is sure.

CHEAP, PRACTICAL HOUSES FOR LAYING OR BREEDING STOCK.

Correspondence

S. J. S.—I have two thoroughbred Plymouth Rock roosters that will be three years old next spring. Will you please tell me if they are too old for breeding next spring. I also have two Barred Plymouth Rock roosters that were hatched in the past April. Will they be too young to breed from in the spring?

A.—The roosters which will be three years old in the spring are just right to mate with pullets. If the cockerels were hatched before May of this year, they will be quite old enough to use next spring. You had better mate them to hens more than a year old.

T. H.—Will you please tell me through your paper where I could get a male Barred Plymouth Rock for breeding purposes? I have a nice flock of pullets and would like to get a male bird of a different family so as to avoid inbreeding. What time of the year would it be best to get him? This fall or in the spring?

A.—I can't publish the addresses of people who have stock for sale in this column. Look through the advertisements and you will probably find what you want. It is always better to buy new birds in the fall or early winter, because breeders have a larger stock to select from, and the weather is not so severe as in early spring, so there is less fear of their getting colds or frozen combs if they have to be shipped by express.

H. M.—You say flour of sulphur will cure the disease spoken of in enclosed clipping. Will you kindly state just how much should be used in—say, a quart of mash. I think I have this trouble among my hens.

A.—The amount of flour of sulphur is two tablespoonfuls to a quart of mash, mixed very thoroughly.

H. H. V.—I was a COMFORT reader for ten years and got lots of help from it, but what I wanted to know now I could not find. My ducks don't lay. I feed two pints bran, one pint middlings and half pint beef scraps twice a day, and in the evening whole corn for ten ducks, and they get sand, oyster shells, greens and cabbage and water—all they like. They are Indian Runners. They lost their feathers last July and August, so I thought they should lay about this time—or am I feeding them wrong? (2) What is the matter with my chickens? They lay sometimes such little eggs we cannot sell them. We feed equal parts oats and wheat in the morning; about one gallon; and in the evening whole corn with the cobs so they have to work it off the cob, and a gallon clabber milk. We got the R. I. Reds. I got them mostly in spring and fall. I also give them cooked potatoes mashed with bran—one gallon a day. (3) How many beef scraps may I give to my eighty-five chickens? (4) Is molasses seed and broom corn seed good for chickens and ducks?

A.—The ducks have hardly had time to recover from the moult yet. You say that you are giving them a mash twice a day and whole corn at night. This is entirely too much. Three pints of mash night and morning with cabbage and other greens in the middle of the day is quite enough. Stop the gallon of cooked potato mash with bran and give them more green stuff; in the winter, sprouted oats or cabbage. If the hens have not been accustomed to beef scraps, give only about half a teaspoonful for each bird, and gradually increase until they are having a tablespoonful each per day, at which time you can keep a supply before them all the time in a self-feeding hopper, and they won't eat more than is good for them. I think you will find wheat, corn and oats the best grain food for poultry.

P. H. M.—I would like to know if you could tell me what is the matter with our chickens. We had some old ones we were killing to eat. Their lungs look real healthy—that is, they were red, and no spots in them, only the small white wens like. I have always seen in chicken lungs. They looked like the young ones do now. In the egg bag there are a few small water sacks. The largest one I have seen is about the size of a red cherry, but there is a hard lump that looks when it is broken, like the yolk of a hard-boiled egg. These are of irregular sizes and shapes. In one hen the lump was as large as an ordinary egg, and this was just like solid flesh packed in layers, and it had a hard crust or coating on the outside, and in this same chicken the liver had some white lumps about the size of a pea in it, but the others were all right. Three of them were laying and had a lot of small eggs. We haven't had any rooster since the first of June. In the flock we have twenty hens and fifty young chicks. They pick their food from the barn and yard, and in the evening and morning they get a half gallon of oats and screenings. They get plenty of fresh water. They have started moulting, and now we only get six or eight eggs a day, but we got from sixteen to twenty eggs this summer. We had twenty-eight hens then, and two have died. Is this a contagious disease, and are the eggs good to use from these hens? Please let me know as soon as possible, and if it is anything contagious and harmful, should we kill the young chicks too, or just the old laying hens in order to get rid of it?

A.—There is no doubt that the egg organs of the hens are very seriously out of order. I have know of cases where hens have laid rotten eggs and eggs without yolks, and the cause has always been an excess of fat in the intestines, or constant dosing with strong egg-producing powders. But such a condition as you describe is new to me, and I cannot tell the cause or the remedy, so will ask our readers to help.

G. K.—Being a subscriber and reader of your paper, I wish you would tell me or write to me what to do for turkeys. I seldom see anything in your columns something that has been tried and cured. My turkeys do all right until they begin to show the red; then they get the diarrhea something like the cholera, but they do not crave for water so much. From that on until they are almost grown they have that disease, and they always die. For me, I have used everything I heard of, but it does no good. It is very discouraging, for I love turkeys, and if you can raise them there is more money in them than in anything else in the poultry line. Please write me what to do so I can try next season. I have sick turkeys right now. They drop around and get so weak, and their heads are blue. Their droppings are yellow slimy looking. My fowls are very tame. I think that is one reason for their being sick. They eat everything, but if I let them run out, they get killed by hunters or dogs. So that is the way I have to look at it too, but my neighbors have it too, about the same way, so that cannot be altogether the fault. Please write me and I will be very grateful to you, as I am very much discouraged.

A. to G. K.—Turkeys are getting more difficult to raise every year, because of the great increase of a disease called "blackhead," which is really a disease of the liver and intestines, which sometimes causes a discoloration of the head. The parasite which causes this disease is Amebæ meleagridis, a minute protoplasmic animal, found to vary between six and ten millionths of an inch in diameter. While they are microscopic in size, they are at least three to four times larger than the red blood corpuscles, but they are, nevertheless, small enough to float in the blood capillaries of the portal system from the cecum to the liver, where they seem to be stopped from going further. This short description of the parasite contains all that is of general interest. It may be summed up as follows: the amebæ is a microscopic animal or parasite capable of living within the tissues of the turkey, its host. It can, therefore, eat, grow, and reproduce itself in great numbers, thereby causing irritations, destruction of the tissues, and nearly always death of the invalid turkeys. The majority of young poults die after a day or two or droopiness. Adults may droop longer and pass into chronic stages of the disease. Refusing to eat and standing apart constitute late symptoms. Starvation in chronic cases produces thinness. When the disease in the cecum is slight, it is oubtful if the affected animals have diarrhea, which is more or less present in other cases. In many of the older poults the droppings will be liquid, and stained orange yellow; this is the most characteristic symptom of all. Sometimes there are blackened blood clots in the droppings, indicating slight hemorrhages. Experiments show that more than four fifths of the young poults, exposed to infected yards, die before they are six weeks old. The disease has been popularly supposed to be one confined to older birds. It is notably a disease affecting young turkeys, but one from which the older turkeys do not escape. Of the one fifth who do escape or survive its ravages, at least ten to twenty per cent may die, throughout the year, at almost any age. Examination of the organs is the only sure means of telling the cause of death. The amebæ are transmitted from diseased turkeys to others through the droppings, which contaminate the food with which they come in contact. Evidence obtained here indicates that the amebæ may also be carried by ordinary fowl, and may be transmitted by them to turkeys in the same manner. So you see once again the importance of exercising strict cleanliness is impressed upon us poultry people, for if droppings are removed regularly, there is little danger of infection. Plow up the old henyards and ground where poultry usually congregates. Disinfect the coops and houses, and don't let the turkeys roost in the same house with the hens. An open shed is the best place for them, even in zero weather. Individual treatment of sick birds is of very little use, but if you want to try doctoring, mix five grains of sulphur and one grain of sulphate of iron for each bird. Give a tablespoonful of Castor oil one hour before and after administering the sulphur and iron. Fifteen grains of catechu in a gallon of drinking water is also recommended, and is, of course, less trouble. After blackhead, I think the most serious trouble that assails turkeys is worms. In fact, some authorities declare that they are the fundamental cause of blackhead. Now, I am a strong believer in prevention rather than cure, and my advice is, to take time by the forelock, and dose the old birds for worms right now. Then there will be far less fear of contamination in the spring, when young ones are around. You may not realize that the old birds have worms, for unless they are very badly affected, they cause the birds no special inconvenience, nor materially affect the health of old birds; but young stock are not strong enough to stand any strain on their vitality and what is more, all intestinal parasites seem to develop and multiply more rapidly in young creatures than in mature stock. Young birds can be kept free if they are properly fed, unless they become contaminated by droppings from other birds. For this reason it is wisdom to purify the old birds, who are strong enough to stand medicine; besides, it is easier to dose a few old birds than a lot of youngsters. Put fifteen grains of asafetida into a quart of water. Empty the ordinary drinking vessels, and put in the mixture. This dose should be given two nights in succession, once a month during the winter, and when the little ones commence to arrive, chop up the green tops of onions and mix with pot cheese or any other soft food you may be using, for at least one feed a day, and don't torture the poor creatures with red pepper. On cold, wet days, add a little ginger and sugar to the drinking water, making it just about as strong as you would for a baby.

J. L. J.—I am having trouble with my young turkeys. Two have died and several others are droopy. Am feeding whole wheat and oats. They have free range in corn fields, stubble land, pasture, and meadow (hayland). Eat lots of apples and watermelon rinds. Roost out in the open. Begin by getting hollow-eyed and pale heads. Next they will be down and can't stand; not long until they die. Have twenty-three which run together. Fed them about half gallon of wheat night and morning for a while. There were thirty ducks, between seventy-five and one hundred chickens and three geese to eat with them most of the time. Am I feeding too much wheat? Will the watermelons or apples harm them?

A—The watermelon rinds and apples can't possibly have done the turkeys any harm. Please read answer to G. K. in this issue.

G. D.—I am in trouble with my turkeys. I had one hundred and forty-five, but they have died down to one hundred and twenty-five. They are not sick over twenty-four hours, and stand around all drawn up, and the droppings are entirely white. I have raised turkeys for years.

A.—The trouble with your turkeys is undoubtedly worms. Read answer to G. K. in this issue.

E. W.—My little chickens are dying when about one week old. Some have a white discharge of the bowels, and others just seem to bloat up, and they will get so big their bodies drag on the ground, and they will try to chirp, and do not make much noise, and if they did it would sound like a mouse or a little bird. I have lost about one hundred and fifty or more. I do not feed them anything for thirty-five hours. Then I feed them hard-boiled eggs with cayenne pepper, and I feed them five a day. They are the Plymouth Rocks, and they are real nice when they are first hatched. They have water in their mouths like the white of an egg.

A.—Your method of feeding has been at fault. The hard-boiled eggs should have been mixed with an equal quantity of stale bread crumbs. Bake slices of stale bread in the oven, until quite brittle, then crush them with the rolling pin or put through a meat chopper. Don't add any red pepper. The mixture should only be fed once a day, from the time they are four days old until ten days old. For the rest of their food give them commercial chick feed. Scatter a little at a time, and let them hunt for it. It is safer to underfeed than to overfeed, until birds are a month old.

H. W.—My chickens do not lay as they ought to. I give them mixed corn morning and night, and clover in between times, and don't see why they don't lay. They have quite a big run. They lay for two or three weeks on and off, but am only getting from two to four eggs from fourteen hens. Would like to know how to feed and what to feed them. Now I have some quite young ones, and they don't seem to grow. They have a run, and get cracked chick corn and baby chick food also, and clover, but still they don't seem to grow. Also would like to know if it is good to keep each kind of chickens separate, or is it best to have them all mixed together.

A.—Perhaps you don't give your young chickens enough animal food. When young chicks are confined in yards and can't hunt worms and insects, they must be supplied with something to take their place. Sweet milk to drink helps when they are quite young; later they should have chopped liver or animal meal. If they haven't been in the habit of having anything of the kind, give very little at first, and increase the quantity gradually as they become accustomed to it; otherwise, it makes bowel trouble.

Feeding Young Calves

A MAN the other day told us that when he went out in the evening he found a fine young bull calf dead in the calf pen. He had seen the calf at nine o'clock in the morning and now it was dead at five thirty p. m. On inquiry we learned that the calf had been fed fresh, sweet skim-milk from the separator. The separator had just been bought and the calves had been suddenly changed from pan skim-milk to separator milk and had been allowed all the milk they could drink twice a day. Some of the foam had been skimmed from the separator milk before feeding, but much of it remained. The dead calf was immensely bloated. No doubt it bloated and suffocated. That is the result of indigestion from too much milk and foamy separator milk is more likely to cause the bloating than milk which has been allowed to stand for some time. It is best to feed young calves three times a day and to have them take the milk slowly. The calves in question drank their milk from the same tub. Each calf should have a little stanchion to itself and be fed from an individual pail. It is better still to have the calf suck its milk from a teat. Pails with such an attachment are sold on the market. They must be kept clean and sweet. If so kept they help to prevent indigestion and calves thrive best when fed in this way. The other moral to be learned from the experience of the farmer quoted is that one should make it his invariable rule to see all animals on the farm three times a day. Many a sickness will be detected and treated in time if this plan is followed. The calf in question might have been "tapped" for relief of bloat and then given a dose of medicine if seen at the outset of the attack. If a man always looks at his stabled horses and cows just before he turns in for the night he will prevent accidents and losses from casting, halters not being buckled on, halter ropes or straps broken, stanchions unlocked and a host of other causes of trouble. Vigilence is the price of success in caring for animals on the farm and depend upon it that the vigilent farmer is the one who has the best "luck" with live stock.

The Pig-Eating Sow

There is nothing very strange about the habit of pig-eating on the part of sows, if one gives the matter a little thought. The habit is an unnatural one and, in our opinion, the result of unnatural conditions surrounding the sow. Left to nature she would be able to find all of the things her stomach craves and her instinct tells her are good for her during pregnancy, or when making milk for pigs. In domestic life these things often are denied her and she is forced to eat the things which man considers best or cheapest for her maintenance. Certain men think that corn is a complete food, and because it is relished by swine must be all that they require. They give it to their brood sows and other swine as a well-nigh exclusive ration and the animals forthwith grow fat. It does not surprise us, however, to find that the sow becomes tired of this continual feast of corn, or that the feed induces dyspepsia. Nor is it strange that she begins to crave other food or something to take the taste of corn out of her mouth or counteract its heating, constipating effects. Indigestion, which we have called dyspepsia, affects such sows and left to nature affected sows would go out and hunt for the things they know would be likely to prove remedial. These include fresh earth, green feed, roots and fresh water. If the sow is penned up she cannot find such things in abundance and the indigestion progressing she may develop depraved appetite which causes her to eat any available foreign body. If no such feed is available is it any wonder that she kills and eats her pigs? She does not do this because she hates her pigs, but because she wants protein-rich feed which has been denied. Corn is rich in fat and heat producing elements, but lacks protein and earthy salts which are absolutely necessary to the complete nutrition of the pregnant sow. Were man to give her a liberal supply of such ingredients she would remain healthy and not be likely to have depraved appetite. Together with adequate supplies of mixed rations it is necessary to enforce exercise. In short we believe that lack of mixed rations and lack of exercise are the chief causes of pig-eating. The way out of the trouble should be patent to our readers. The sow must be made to take plenty of exercise every day throughout pregnancy. If the weather is cold and the ground covered with snow the farmer is apt to leave the sows in-doors for days or weeks on end. If at the same time the corn-stuffing process prevails the sow will soon become sick, or cross, or unnatural in every way and eat their pigs at birth. Enforce exercise by sprinkling whole oats on a big barn floor and cover it with litter. Let the sows root for the oats and they will get the exercise they need. The popular preventive for pig-eating is to feed salt pork to the sows. That is not a sensible practise. The same thing to do is to give the sows little corn, but a lot of other nutritious feed that contains sufficient protein, or flesh-forming matter. It is a good plan to feed Alfalfa or clover hay in winter and to add one pound or so of roots or silage each day as a laxative feed. Sows do not do well if fed large quantities of roots or silage and the silage must be perfectly free from mold and should not be frozen. Free access should also be allowed to slacked lime, wood ashes and wood or corncob charcoal. The protein-rich feeds may be one or two of the following list: middlings, shorts, bran, oatmeal, barley meal, flaxseed meal and tankage. Not over ten per cent of the last named feed should be given to a pregnant sow and it should be gradually introduced as it is very rich. Also it should be remembered that a tankage mixture must be fed fresh. If it is allowed to stand and ferment it seems to develop toxins or poisons which may cause ptomaine poisoning. Cholera often is suspected when really the disease is due to the formation of such poisons in decomposing and fermenting slop. In addition to proper feeding and not giving more rich feed than is necessary, it is highly important to accustom the sow to the presence of man and to be handled by him. If such training is not given she may be cross and nervous in his presence at farrowing time and so kill her pigs. We believe too that the constipated, unfit sow suffers great and unnecessary pain at farrowing and may kill her pigs on that account. If she comes to the farrowing time muscular and with bowels active she will not be likely to have any difficulty in having her pigs and will not suffer or be cross. Stop pampering pregnant sows. Feed to keep them in a natural condition and have them accustomed to man and they will not be likely to kill and eat their pigs or have trouble at farrowing.

Keeping Up the Milk Flow in Winter

As soon as cold weather sets in cows begin to shrink in milk. This is because more food is required to keep their bodies warm. Animal heat must be kept up. Life processes must go on. The food is first used for these purposes. Whatever is left over goes to make milk. There are three ways to keep cows warm,—by the use of warm quarters, by giving warm (not ice cold) water to drink, and by feeding winter foods.

Warm Quarters Necessary

The stables for dairy cows should be warm enough for comfort. The cows should not be allowed to run out of doors much in winter weather, only an hour or two in the warmest part of the day for exercise and to get drink. They should be kept up during very cold weather and on stormy days. A good rule to follow is this: turn the cows out of doors on those days when the farmer himself finds it comfortable to go about in his shirt-sleeves.

Warm Water Desirable

Good dairymen find it profitable to warm the water for their stock. This is accomplished by the use of a tank heater in which a fire is kept burning long enough to melt all ice, take off the chill and heat the water to a summer temperature. Cows drink more of such water, which aids digestion and thus increases the milk flow in addition to the feed it saves by helping to keep the cows warm.

Winter Foods for Dairy Cows

June pasture provides the ideal conditions for a heavy milk flow. Every farmer knows this. He has seen the yield creep up when the pastures get good and shrink again when they grow short later in the summer. The good dairyman provides "June pasture," as nearly as he can, for winter feed. Of course we understand that this is impossible literally, but many of the June conditions can be duplicated. The warm quarters and the warm water mentioned above are part of this plan, the winter ration the rest. The winter ration should contain one green feed, soft and succulent and relished by stock. This feed should be fed to balance the ration. Mixed hay is best, but clover, peas or Alfalfa may be used. It is best to mix the latter plants with corn when used as silage. Sugar beets are the best roots, though mangels or rutabagas may be used.

With the roots or silage, clover or Alfalfa hay should be fed to balance the ration. Mixed hay is not so good and Timothy is of little value as a milk producer. This should be supplemented by a grain ration,—the poorer the hay the more the grain.

Some Good Winter Rations

Below is a list of feeds arranged in order of their feeding value, those of highest protein content being placed at the top of each list.

HAY OR ROUGHAGE.	GRAIN.	GREEN FEEDS.
Alfalfa.	Oil Meal.	Corn Silage.
Clover.	Gluten feed.	Clover silage
Mixed hay.	Malt sprouts.	Pea silage.
Timothy.	Bran.	Sugar beets.
Prairie.	Oats.	Mangels.
Marsh.	Corn.	Rutabagas.

To make a balanced ration at least one of the feeds from near the top of the first two lists should be fed. If the hay or roughage is very poor a mixture of two grains is advisable. This is illustrated in the following:

Sample Rations

Ration No. 1.
- Clover hay, ... 15 lbs.
- Oats, ... 5 "
- Sugar beets, ... 25 "

Ration No. 2.
- Alfalfa hay, ... 12 "
- Corn silage, ... 30 "

Ration No. 3.
- Alfalfa hay, ... 10 "
- Bran, ... 3 "
- Mangels, ... 20 "

Ration No. 4.
- Timothy hay, ... 20 "
- Oil meal, ... 1 "
- Bran, ... 6 "
- Corn silage, ... 30 "

Ration No. 5.
- Marsh hay, ... 25 "
- Oil meal ..... 2 "
- Bran, ... 8 "
- Mangels, ... 20 "

Ration No. 6.
- Mixed hay, ... 15 "
- Oats (ground), ... 4 "
- Corn (ground), ... 4 "
- Oil meal, ... 2 "
- Rutabagas, ... 20 "

A better ration than any of the above is made as follows:
- Alfalfa hay, ... 12 lbs.
- Oil meal, ... 1 "
- Bran, ... 3 "
- Corn silage, ... 30 "

Use Home-Grown Feeds

Successful dairymen use home-grown feeds whenever possible, but if no high protein feeds, such as are found at the top of the lists, are grown, then some high protein grains must be purchased if best results are to be secured from the herd during winter months. The cheapest home-grown protein feeds are the clovers and Alfalfa, with the various kinds of peas and beans suitable for stock feed a close second.

Differences in Cows

There are large differences in the food requirements of different cows. The rations given above must be varied to suit the animal. Some cows require more, others less, depending upon the milk flow. As a general rule, however, the more milk a cow gives the more food she requires.

Fresh Meat for Farm Tables

Why should the farmer not have fresh meat to use as often as the city man? He is the man who breeds the beef cattle, feeds the pigs, herds the sheep and grows the grain on which they are all fattened. But he eats the salt meat while his city cousin has it fresh and palatable.

There are two ways in which he can provide himself with fresh meat and thus avoid buying it back from the city butcher for twice what he got for it in the first place.

The Farm Icehouse

It doesn't take an expensive building for the storage of ice. Any farmer in the northern tier of states may have an icehouse at small expense. A board shanty with a good roof and double walls stuffed in between with sawdust or chaff will keep ice all summer. If the haul is not too long, two days' work of a team and two men will put up all the ice a farmer needs. In the center of his icehouse he may have a small room protected by an outside and an inside door in which he can hang his fresh meat where it will keep as well as in anybody's refrigerator if surrounded by ice.

Canned Fresh Meat

Another cheaper method of providing fresh meat and one perhaps much more widely applicable is to put it up in ordinary glass fruit cans. The meat is stripped from the bones, no bones being placed in the cans. The raw meat is then packed tightly in the cans and the cover put on but not screwed down. The cans are placed in the wash boiler so that they cannot touch each other and protected on the bottom against breakage, as in ordinary canning of fruit, and steamed for three hours, when they are taken out and the tops screwed down. If desired, salt and pepper may be added to suit taste before cooking. Meat prepared in this way cannot be told from fresh meat and will keep all summer.

If it is desired to can bony pieces the meat may be boiled in the least possible amount of water until it slips from the bone. The bone is then removed and the meat canned in exactly the same way as fruit. Bones left in the meat, however, will cause it to spoil. Either beef or mutton may be canned in this way and lean pork, too, if desired.

Frying Down Pork

Fresh hams and shoulders may be preserved by frying down. They are sliced ready for cooking, salted to taste, fried in an ordinary frying pan and the slices packed while hot in an earthen jar that has been previously scalded. The lard that fries out in cooking is poured over it and the last layer completely covered when filled. Fresh pork prepared in this way will keep well for a long time.

Winter the Time to Start a Cheese Factory

In many localities the profitable dairy industry is not developed because of lack of a suitable market. When butter and cheese are made on farms and sold in small quantities to local dealers no uniform quality can be secured, the packages are inferior and the means of handling the product so inadequate that only the lowest of prices can be obtained. Dairying, under these conditions, yields little or no profit. Such communities need a local factory to manufacture either butter or cheese. Of the two the cheese factory is the easier to start because it requires fewer cows and less capital; besides cheese is easier to handle and to keep in storage.

How Much Capital is Needed for a Cheese Factory?

A cheese factory large enough to take care of any amount of milk daily, up to 10,000 pounds, can be built and fully equipped for about $1,500 under average conditions. Where labor and building material are cheap, or in communities where the farmers are willing to furnish a portion of the labor themselves, much less cash capital will be necessary, say from $800 to $1,000.

How Many Cows are Needed to Make a Cheese Factory Pay?

Any community that can furnish milk from two hundred cows to a single factory can make a cheese factory pay. This means that not less than three thousand pounds of milk daily are needed as not all of the two hundred cows will be in milk at any one time. An average of 25 pounds per day per cow is a high average. More often it is 20 pounds or even less. Two hundred cows giving 20 pounds each will yield a daily run of 4,000 pounds. This will make about 400 pounds of cheese.

What It Costs to Run a Cheese Factory

If the company or owner of the factory, whichever the case may be, charges one and one half cents per pound for making and an average of 400 pounds of cheese is produced per day, the factory will earn $6.00 per day or $180 per month. A good cheese maker can be hired for about $80 per month, not less. This leaves about $100 per month, or say $1,000 per year, to pay other operating expenses. The year's statement will look something like this:

Operating Expenses:

Interest, 6 per cent on $1,500, ...	$90
Taxes, ...	30
Insurance, ...	10
Fuel, ...	100
Supplies (including salt, color, rennet, cloth, washing powder, tools, machinery, etc., etc.), ...	300
Salaries:
Cheese maker, ...	960
Secretary, ...	25
Total expenditures,	$1,515
Receipts:
Received for making, $180 per month for 12 months, ...	$2160

Net profit over and above all expenses, $645

It will be noted that if the factory lies idle three months of the year the net profit is cut down to $105, since the operating charges and salaries are fixed charges, as a rule. If it lies idle four months of the year the profit is converted into a loss. The same is true if the amount of cheese made falls to an average of 300 pounds daily. This would result from a reduction in the number of cows or a shrinkage of milk per cow. These things often turn a prosperous factory into a losing one.

How to Organize for Starting a Cheese Factory

There are two things necessary,—money and cows—$1,500 in money and not less than two hundred cows. To get the money, organize a co-operative stock company and sell shares at $10 or more each. Limit the amount of stock that can be subscribed by any one person to $100. This will insure getting at least fifteen men into the company. More are better; fifty or a hundred are none too many. Let those who are not able to pay cash for their stock pay for it in labor or wood or building material. But before the money is raised find out how many farmers there are in the neighborhood who will furnish cows. Get each farmer to agree to furnish a definite number of cows. Remember at least two hundred good cows are necessary to insure success, and the more cows the more certain the profits. When the cows are promised go ahead and form a company, raise the money and build. With a cheese factory once established on a paying basis, a uniform product is obtained, a ready and certain home market is assured and a handsome milk check comes to hand every month.

For the establishment of a creamery, double the number of cows and about $4,000 in capital are needed.

Preparing Grain for Show

Many a farmer who reads this paper has looked with wonder or astonishment at the fine samples of grain exhibited at the state fairs and other great grain and product shows of the country and wished that he might be able to produce such grain. There are tricks in every trade and it is quite possible for any farmer who uses pedigree seed to make a fine exhibit of his product. If the crop happens to have been extra light, or the grain has become badly damaged by wetting in the shock, stack or granary, or shows actual disease such as rust or smut, it will not be worth while to attempt making an exhibit, but if the grain is plump, of good color and the yield a good one a fine sample may be exhibited. The sample must be hand-picked, however, if it is to win. First half a bushel should be run through a clean fanning mill to get rid of chaff, light kernels, dirt and weed seeds. Then the sample should be well shaken and swirled around in a hand sieve or riddle to bring remaining trash to the surface so that it can be rejected. When the grain has been cleaned in this way it must be hand picked laboriously and patiently and the work also requires a sharp eye and a good knowledge of what constitutes perfect grain, whether it be wheat, rye, barley, oats or some other variety of grain. A peck is the average amount of grain exhibited and that amount should be carefully selected. A good plan of procedure is to cover a small table with white paper then pour onto it a teaspoonful of grain at a time. Spread this amount of grain out thin, so that each kernel can be readily seen. At once pick out and reject kernels of alien grain, as oats in wheat, each discolored kernel and each kernel that is not plump, large and fine in every way. The good kernels now are swept into a receptacle for the purpose and the poor ones into another vessel. This work can be done by all the young folk of the family, a little at a time, so that gradually the full amount of needed grain is obtained. If a prize is won it will stimulate the young folks to better grain growing and there also is "good money" in showing so that the work is paid for well.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

AUNT SOPHRONIA'S SAINT

The Story of an Old Maid, a Red-Headed Girl, and a Nice Young Man

By W. S. Birge, M. D.

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

VERY few girls were like Katherine Kinney, and very few would have done what she did.

In the first place, when she was dressed up she was one of the prettiest girls imaginable.

The addedum, "dressed up," is added because, her beauty not being of the classic type, with straight brows and regular features, when she was not dressed up she did not look nearly so well. Her hair was abundant and of a glossy copper-brown, but it was as straight as the locks of the young Hiawatha or the fringe on an arm-chair, and everyone knows how infinitely more becoming is a gentle ripple or a crest of curls. A heated iron did the work perfectly, and adorned Katherine with a coronet of sun-kissed waves worthy of an empress; but she always felt that should the science of turning out curling-irons become extinct, she would lose this charm of hers, and that the charm was no charm at all, but a delusion and a snare.

Her eyes were naturally large and bright, however, and did not depend upon any outside assistance; so this rather offset the matter of the hair. But her nose, on the other hand, was tip-tilted, and this was another thing that distressed her greatly; for no matter how our friends may speak of them as piquant, retrousse and saucy, we who have turned-up noses are conscious that they are nothing after all but pugs. It is the same with red hair. Agreeable people call it Titian and burnished gold, and that sort of thing, but we know it is just plain red, and that tomato soup is more the shade. Dark-haired or blonde people know nothing of the sensitiveness of these points, especially in early youth, and that there is probably no more unhappy object in the world than a Titian-haired schoolgirl with a nez retrousse.

But to return to Katherine.

Her hair was straight, but capable of being pinched into ripples of great beauty; her eyes were bright, and her nose, when her face was held downward, was what enthusiastic young ladies call "cute." Her hands and feet were very pretty little works of art, indeed, and her figure was trim to a degree. She had excellent taste in the manner of dress, and knew that a chic style was particularly becoming to her. Sailor collars, little jackets, hats set a bit aslant and mannish little walking-suits were what suited her best, though in full evening dress, with flowers at her corsage and an aigret in her hair, she was decidedly "a winner."

Like all healthy, right-minded girls, Katherine liked to look well, and found the effort to do so no effort at all.

She wound the copper-brown locks religiously around the iron prongs and pinched them vigorously holding the instrument with aching arm until she could feel the heat penetrating to her scalp, without ever once complaining of or objecting to this little private auto da fe, and she tied her neckties over and over again until they were at just the proper angle, with untiring patience.

It was a joke in the family that should the house take fire, Katherine would refuse to come down until she had curled her hair, put a pin in the back of her belt to keep that and her skirt from parting company, and stuck a flower in her buttonhole.

Such a precise young woman was Miss Katherine Kinney. But sometimes a very great stress of circumstances leads us to give up our strongest peculiarities. Katherine had been sent down into the country to pay a visit to her aunt, and Katherine did not like the country or this aunt. She did not object to the country so much in the summer, when there were plenty of people about and lots of things to do; but in the early spring, when it was frightfully muddy and nothing as yet in bloom, it was—well, in short, it was deadly dull.

But if there were times when she liked the country, there were never times when she liked her aunt. She was an old maid, or rather—as there are no more such things—a Superior Woman, and she had many eccentricities. Even her name was depressing—Aunt Sophronia. Could anything be more unfortunate than to be christened Sophronia? If one's name had anything to do with one's chances, Sophronies are doomed from the cradle. Aunt Sophronia had a very nice place in the country, where she and her four women-servants dwelt in constant fear of tramps. So nervous was Aunt Sophronia on the subject that she laid in a large supply of firearms, which were hung all about the walls, giving the place a very warlike appearance, and which, as Aunt Sophronia and all the maids were desperately afraid to touch, were white with dust.

Of ammunition there was none, a cartridge, bullet or particle of gunpowder being quite as terrible to the old lady as tramps themselves.

Every male figure which was seen approaching the house was set down as one of these desperadoes; and sometimes, when the eminently respectable clergyman or one of the bank directors turned in at the gate to pay his respects, Aunt Sophronia, who was short of sight, would shriek to her maids:

"Here, he comes at last!" and rushing down, would slam and bolt the door in his eminently respectable face.

It was to this grim personage that one of the Kinney children was sent down each year for a month as a sort of hostage.

Mr. Kinney was Aunt Sophronia's only brother, and as he had not consulted her in the least with regard to his marriage, a hostage was necessary. He had married one of the most charming girls in town, but Sophronia objected to marriage on general principles.

This year it was Katherine's turn. She did not want to go, but people sometimes have to do what they don't want to in this world. She was sulky when she arrived at Aunt Sophronia's, and sulky she remained.

As Aunt Sophronia had bronchitis, and remained in one room most of the time, Katherine was left pretty much to herself, and she soon realized that this was the only way to enjoy oneself at Aunt Sophronia's. There were lots of books in the library, a puff-ball of a white kitten to play with, and a pantry where doughnuts were to be found. After a week she began really almost to enjoy herself, and she inwardly prayed that nobody might interfere with her pastimes.

Now, Aunt Sophronia had a distant cousin, a young man of twenty-four. This sounds very interesting, and everyone will decide at once that Katherine was deeply attached to the young man; but such was not the case. From morning till night, and from night till morning again, she had the praises of this individual sounded in her ears. "Dear Lawrence was such a saint." He never smoked; he never touched a drop of anything stronger than lemonade; he never used slang, was always in bed by ten o'clock, and went around chanting anthems all the day long. In short, all he needed was a neat little pair of wings to carry him off to his proper sphere. As a natural result of such conditions, Katherine hated him. She had never seen him, but that was nothing. A man like that ought to be canonaded instead of canonized. Not that she liked wild or dissipated youths, but one who never even used slang—he must be a perfect cad, and she would like to tell him so.

Aunt Sophronia never wearied of expatiating on his virtues and angelic tendencies, until Katherine made up her mind that he was a little, puny, white-haired, shrinking creature, with as much spirit as a fly, and that he was possibly consumptive. She had her suspicions of a man with wings.

One day, when she had been at Aunt Sophronia's a little over a week, Aunt Sophronia greeted her at the breakfast table with a smile of exceeding joy.

"Who do you think is coming?" she asked, holding up a closely-scrawled letter.

"Who?" asked Katherine, eagerly.

"Lawrence Lane!"

"Not that hor— you don't mean it, Aunt Sophronia?" and a fierce little light came into Katherine's eyes.

"Yes, dear Lawrence is coming to pay me his long-promised visit. What a treat it will be for you, Katherine."

"Treat! Aunt Sophronia! I am going home next week; I'm sure mamma needs me."

Any subterfuge was not too great to get out of the way of seeing this abominable paragon.

"No, my dear, your mother doesn't need you in the least; and even if she did, I am sure she would consent to your staying in order to see a young gentleman of such great virtues. Who knows, Katherine, what may happen? Dear Lawrence may possibly take a fancy to you—he is a great admirer of beauty." This was something altogether unusual in Aunt Sophronia, but perhaps she was so pleased at the prospect of seeing her idol that she allowed herself to be complimentary for once. "It would be a splendid thing for you, not only because he is such a high-principled young man, but because one of these days he will be very rich. I do not mind telling you that I have made him my heir. I have not left anything but a silver teapot to your father, because he went and got married. It was very heartless of him.

"Yes, Katherine, dear Lawrence may chance to fall in love with you—for strange things are always happening—and it will be a splendid match for you."

Katherine arose from the table and faced her aunt, the little retrousse nose higher than ever in the air.

"Aunt Sophronia, I hate this nasty Lawrence Lane! Yes, I know that's a very horrid word, and young ladies should never use it, but it's what he is—nasty. I wouldn't look at him."

Aunt Sophronia only smiled. She was bound not to be vexed at anything today. She was too much pleased at her good news.

"How do you know what he is?" she asked. "You have never seen him."

"And, what's more, I never mean to," answered Katherine, hotly. "I am going home on Friday."

Aunt Sophronia only smiled more provokingly.

"That won't help matters, my dear," she said, sweetly.

"Why not?" demanded Katherine.

"Because, my child, dear Lawrence arrives today."

CHAPTER II.

Katherine did not wait to hear any more. Leaving her aunt seated at the breakfast-table, she rushed off up-stairs to her own room and locked and bolted the door.

So that horrible, wishy-washy, goody-goody Lawrence Lane was coming down there to destroy her peace! Maybe he was on his way now—a temperance button fastened in his coat, tracts sticking out of all of his pockets. Oh, it was too much! And then to think of the further slight Aunt Sophronia had put upon her by suggesting that he might fall in love with her and that it would be a splendid match. Splendid match indeed! Why, she would rather be as old a maid as Aunt Sophronia—the very thought of it made her shudder.

Had it been possible she would have started for home that very hour and thereby avoided seeing him; but as she was not allowed to travel alone, and did not know, morever, how to check her trunk, it was not possible; so she began casting about in her mind the best means of eluding him, and what she should do in order that he should not fall in love with her. On that point she was positive—this living saint, this sanctimonious young man, this cherub with sprouting wings should not fall in love with her. She would do almost anything to prevent it. Let us see—what had Aunt Sophronia said? In the first place, that he was a great admirer of beauty.

All at once a brilliant thought came to her—a thought so brilliant, so positively brilliant, that she decided to carry it out at once, and to the letter. When the idea struck her she was dressed in the most charming of house-frocks. A pretty scarlet silk waist, belted in by a trim belt of the same hue, and fastened by a great silver buckle; a neat, well-fitting serge skirt, and her hair—unusually well curled and waved—was caught in a soft, full knot at the back. There was no denying the fact that Katherine looked particularly well and fresh that morning. Even her little nez retrousse seemed a shade longer and more Greek.

Hastily divesting herself of these bright and pretty garments, she went to an old-fashioned mahogany wardrobe in the hall and began fishing out all sorts of antiquated articles. They belonged to Aunt Sophronia, but Katherine did not mind that in the least. She presently returned with an armful of these garments to the middle of the room, where she threw them in a heap upon the bed.

Then she lifted the water-jug and poured some water into the basin.

A fierce little fire burned in her eye at what she was about to do.

Plunging her head into the basin, she rubbed the water savagely through her hair, and when she came up, lo! she was divested of her beautiful curls, shorn as was Samson while he slept. Instead of the charming waves that had rippled backward from her temples, there were now only a few long, dank, dismal locks, such as the drowned Ophelia might have worn, and instead of the little ringlets that had strayed so innocently above her brows nothing remained but some strands of seaweed, limp and melancholy.

A glance in the mirror satisfied Katherine that no one could possibly call her a beauty now.

With the brush she smeared and plastered the once fluffy hair until it was as smooth and opaque as a stagnant pool. Then she parted it severely through the center, and rolled the rest up in a hard, round billiard-ball at the back of her head. The effect she studied with pleasure. A more inartistic unbecoming coiffure it would be hard to find, even in Zululand, where coiffures are remarkable. And as Katherine depended upon dress and taste to look her best, she was not at that moment the "winner" she usually was.

She further heightened her charms by donning an old-fashioned blue bodice, known as a jersey, with the plainest, narrowest kind of sleeves, whereas, at the time she did these things, people wore the fluffiest, puffiest kind of sleeves and an immense amount of frills.

Next she stepped into a voluminous black skirt, with extraordinary black draperies and fringed overskirt, and smiled ecstatically at the figure she presented.

Not satisfied with her transformation yet, she even went so far as to bring out a pair of Aunt Sophronia's common-sense shoes, flat-heeled, broad-toed and of goodly length and proportions. These she stuffed out with bits of paper, and drew on in place of her own small, tapering ones. Instead of peeping out from beneath her skirt, like the proverbial little mice, these great things glared out like very monsters.

Katherine was simply charmed.

"Great admirer of beauty, is he?" she exclaimed scornfully, as she gazed at her reflection in the mirror. "Then I am not 'in it,' and that's dead sure!" And she laughed heartily to think how dreadfully shocked the saintly Lawrence Lane would be to hear such expressions.

Katherine was a college girl, and she had picked up a great many expressions in those halls of learning—some of which were not scientific.

She had just finished her toilet, when she heard a commotion down-stairs and the sound of several voices. Very softly she stole out and peered over the banisters. Before she could make out anything, she heard a boisterous voice saying:

"Awfully glad, myself; place just as rum as ever."

Of course, this could not be the seraphic Lawrence, who never used slang. But who could it be, then? The voice sounded very manly. Katherine leaned a little farther over and strained her eyes. As far as she could make out, it was a great, broad-shouldered fellow who was talking to Aunt Sophronia and who, moreover, had his arm around her.

The stranger whoever he was, almost had the surprise of seeing a trim little figure in queer garments come tumbling down the stairs, but Katherine caught herself just in time, and as she did so, Aunt Sophronia looked up and called her.

Katherine sprang back, but not before both of them had seen her, and she felt that there was nothing for her to do but to go down. So down she went, her broad heels making anything but a dainty click as she descended the stairs. Indeed, each step was like a small-sized earthquake.

"This is my niece, Miss Katherine Kinney, Mr. Lane," said Aunt Sophronia; and Mr. Lane stepped forward with outstretched hand. Katherine saw the smile which was on his face quickly vanish as his eye traveled along her length, and she almost fancied he shuddered as he bowed and said, stiffly:

"Very happy to meet you, Miss Kinney."

And so this was Lawrence Lane—this big, jolly, pink-faced, curly-haired fellow.

Katherine felt her hatred increase. A man who looked like this could not possibly be a saint, therefore he must be a hypocrite. Quite as stiffly she bowed and said:

"Mr. Lane."

"There, Katherine!" exclaimed Aunt Sophronia, eying her from head to foot. "I never saw you looking so well!"

Katherine was furious. To think of Aunt Sophronia saying she looked well in that horrible guise, and before a stranger, too.

But, then, it was only that disgusting Lawrence Lane, so what did it matter? She looked quickly up at him, and saw a look in his face that said as plainly as anything that if she never looked so well before, what must she be at other times?

"Thank you, Aunt Sophronia," she remarked. "You flatter me."

"Not at all," said Aunt Sophronia, coolly. "These are the most stylish things I've ever seen you wear. And now, Katherine, won't you take Lawrence for a little walk around the garden—it isn't too wet—while I see that they get up a good luncheon for him?"

Katherine was on the point of refusing, but not seeing very well how she could do so, muttered a sulky consent.

"Go up and get your things, then," said Aunt Sophronia.

Katherine went up.

Her handsome tailor-made coat and stylish velvet hat were on a chair but she did not even look at them. Passing into Aunt Sophronia's room, she seized upon her old blanket-shawl and prim, gray bonnet. These she adjusted with all the solemnity possible and glanced in the mirror. What would he think of her now?

When she descended, "dear Lawrence" had an indented brown felt hat known as a "Sportsman" in his hand.

"Do put on your overcoat, Lawrence," besought Aunt Sophronia solicitously. "You might take cold."

"Bosh!" exclaimed the saint, showing all his white teeth in a laugh. "I have no use for such things as colds, Cousin Soph."

Katherine eyed him from under the gray bonnet with distrust.

Nice language for a saint!

"Now, run along," said Aunt Sophronia, gently pushing them.

The saint stood aside to let Katherine pass, and then came out after her.

They walked the whole length of the garden without a word being said on either side, and then Katherine, turning stiffly toward him, observed:

"It's a beautiful day."

"Yes," assented "dear Lawrence," "first-class."

"Do you like the country, Mr. Lane?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, at this season I think it's a bit slow, but in the summer it's out of sight."

Aha! Hadn't she known he was a hypocrite?

"But why should you mind its being slow," inquired Katherine, scornfully, "when you retire at ten o'clock?"

"Do the doors here close at ten?" asked the saint.

"Certainly," stiffly.

"Can't you climb out of any of the windows?"

The wretch, would it be better to tell Aunt Sophronia how mistaken she was in her idol or let her find it out for herself?

She scorned to answer his question, and once more they promenaded the length of the garden in silence. This time the saint broke it.

"I say," he began, "were you and Cousin Soph schoolmates?"

Oh! the abominable, insolent wretch.

"No," returned Katherine, with a toss of the gray bonnet, "we were not!"

"Oh, pardon me," "dear Lawrence" hastened to say. "When I first saw you, you looked about the same age, but now I perceive you're a little younger. Are you, too, an e—eh—aw—ahem!"

"Old maid?" put in Katherine, viciously, enjoying his embarrassment. "Yes!"

"Indeed?" he returned, calmly. "So I supposed."

Katherine was ready to choke him.

"Don't you like old maids?" she demanded, fiercely.

"Well," he admitted, "sometimes—when they are real sweet and amiable."

"Aunt Sophronia said you were a great admirer of beautiful girls. Are you?"

The saint did not reply for a moment. Then all at once he seemed to make up his mind to do the polite.

Looking full at her, he made her a graceful bow, and said pointedly:

"I like homely ones. They're so—o— pathetic, don't you know."

If glances can annihilate, Aunt Sophronia's saint should have crumbled to pieces at that moment.

When they returned from their unamiable stroll, Katherine was convinced that no greater hypocrite walked the earth than this same Lawrence Lane. This conclusion was only strengthened by a little episode at luncheon. Aunt Sophronia had out some of her famous brandy-peaches, splendid articles put up in the most fiery old fluid. The saint made way with every one given him with surprising facility, in view of the lemonade theory.

"Won't you have some more peaches, Lawrence dear?" inquired the old lady.

"Thank you, Cousin Soph. No more peaches, but a little more of the gravy, if you please."

CHAPTER III.

As the days went on, Katherine's hatred and contempt grew stronger and stronger, and Aunt Sophronia's saint grew less and less saintly. He was always making a noise about the house, whistling, singing, banging. He had discovered the way to the pantry, too, and several times Katherine came upon him suddenly engaged in predatory excursions, and he didn't even have the grace to blush.

Those even, white teeth of his were always in evidence, until he was like the walking advertisement for a dental surgeon.

Ugh! how she hated him.

She soon found out from the way he would rush to the window to stare at them that he did admire pretty girls, and so she took particular pains to keep up her eccentric style of dress and not to be a pretty girl.

She never curled her hair any more, and to be without this daily half-hour of self-torture became a positive relief, and she began seriously to contemplate never being pretty again. Aunt Sophronia's clothes, too, were so much easier than her own stiff little tailor-made ones.

She was really enjoying being homely, and was beginning to look upon beauty as a decided disadvantage, when one day something happened. "Dear Lawrence" had been at Aunt Sophronia's almost a week, and during that time the weather had been growing steadily milder and milder, until finally it bloomed into a regular summer day.

"Hilda Crosby is coming over to spend the afternoon, so why don't all of you go for a row on the lake?" suggested Aunt Sophronia.

The saint was delighted. He rushed up-stairs to overhaul his traps until he found his yachting-cap, and they could hear him whistling and singing halfway down the street.

Katherine went up to get herself ready also. Now, Hilda Crosby was the prettiest girl in town, with rosy cheeks, light, fluffy hair and sweet little dimples.

A dangerous rival, certainly!

Bah, what did Katherine care about rivals! That is, in regard to Lawrence Lane. She only hoped he would admire Hilda. So she buttoned up her narrow jersey, plastered down her stringy hair and further heightened the effect by a sunbonnet of Aunt Sophronia's.

"Oh, my!" she exclaimed, as she regarded herself, "if I'm not a howling success!"

Hilda Crosby arrived soon after luncheon, and never in all her life had she looked so sweet. Her navy-blue serge with the dash of scarlet at the throat and her stylish broad-brimmed straw hat and nodding roses set off her dimples and rosy cheeks to perfection.

She could not repress a pitying little glance as she gazed at poor Katherine in her unfashionable garments. The look delighted Katherine. It only assured her of her perfect success in the role she was playing.

Presently down came the saint, two steps at a time, yodling a favorite strain of his known as the "Deitch Company." He bounded into the room more like a ubiquitous puppy than a seraph, and stopped short as his eye fell on Hilda's pretty little figure.

Aunt Sophronia presented him to the young girl, and he did not shudder at all as he shook hands with her.

Then all three sallied forth.

The saint blandly informed them that he felt in "great shape" that afternoon, and, indeed, he looked it. The yachting-cap sat astride his gay curls right royally, and his sack coat fitted his athletic figure with great nicety.

Hilda looked up at him with little, shy, admiring glances, and he returned them with interest.

Katherine, in her sunbonnet, felt sulky.

"What she can see in that detestable Lawrence Lane!" she mentally ejaculated.

The lake was not far away, and this afternoon looked like a sheet of glass.

Aunt Sophronia owned a little cedar boat, which was kept locked up at the boathouse, and this was the first time this season it had been called for.

The girls stood on the float as Lawrence and the hired man carried down the boat, and stepped aside as the launching of her sent the water up in little streams through the cracks. "Dear Lawrence" took the oars and sat in the middle, gripping the edge of the float as the man assisted the young ladies to get in. Hilda uttered little shrill shrieks as the small craft swayed from side to side beneath their feet.

"You don't want to move about much," suggested the man. "You might upset her."

He seated them as seemed proper to him, the pretty young lady facing the gentleman; the plain, queer-looking young lady behind where he could not see her, and in this manner they set off. Lawrence pulled with long, lazy, leisurely strokes, and the sharp, clean feather of his oars clipped the water with a pleasant sound. Presently he asked their permission, and threw off his coat. He had on underneath, one of those heavy worsted garments which labors under the elegant title of "Sweater," and which clung closely to his athletic form.

His face grew pinker and pinker with fresh air and exercise, and when he pushed back his cap his hair was all in damp, glossy rings about his temples.

Katherine, who had the satisfaction of seeing only his back, observed, with growing displeasure, that his neck was fair and smooth, and that his shoulders came up square and strong with the backward stroke. She also observed, with even more displeasure, that Hilda was gazing at him with unbounded admiration, and echoing his merry laugh with her little cackle.

At first Katherine was only annoyed because Hilda was showing her feelings so plainly, and then she began to feel angry and cross and horrid generally, for however much she might detest "dear Lawrence's" face, she could not deny that his back was a splendid one, and that his head was finely poised on his shoulders.

"Miss Sophronia told me what a perfect saint you are," said Hilda.

"Yes, that's just it," returned Lawrence; "it's too bad of her, and I'm sure I do everything to prevent it. I suppose it's because the dear old girl is so fond of me that she thinks so. Why, I can't chant a topical song without her thinking it one of Moody and Sankey's; and she dilates upon my extreme fondness for lemonade when I tell her distinctly that I prefer it with a 'stick' in it. It all comes of my not smoking. She seems to think because I don't do that I don't do anything else. Jingo, I wish she didn't think me such an angel, for whatever I am, I'm not a hypocrite!"

Katherine started and winced.

"No, indeed," returned Hilda, promptly, "you're not a hypocrite; but, then, Mr. Lane, I'm not so sure that Miss Sophronia is mistaken in you after all."

Silly thing! Katherine could have shaken her then and there.

And so Lawrence Lane was not a saint after all, and did not even want to be. Why——

Katherine began to feel very queer, indeed, and somehow the satisfaction in her jersey and sunbonnet commenced to wane.

What a fright she must look sitting there! Why on earth had Hilda put on that gown and

THE COTTON STYLE SHOW

Washington's Society Leaders Set the Style to Dress in Cotton

By Edna Mary Colman

AN impending calamity of nation-wide magnitude that the European war threatens to impose on the people of this country gives promise of being averted through the efforts of three society girls, for they have started a capaign to buy cotton, wear cotton and use cotton that is spreading all over the country and is doing more practical good to keep money in circulation, mills and factories going, dinner pails filled, and the specter of want from the door than all of the Fourth of July orations and municipal demonstrations of patriotism put together.

Washington has had a Cotton Style Show, gotten up and carried through to a magnificent success by Miss Genevieve Clark, daughter of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Miss Lucy Burleson, daughter of Postmaster General Burleson, and Miss Callie Hoke Smith, daughter of the Georgia Senator, all of them yet in their teens and gay, fun-loving society girls, to whom one would not ordinarily credit serious thoughts of politics and economics. These young ladies, however, have all had exceptional home advantages, with the result that they are keen, wide awake, well read and thoroughly informed upon the big questions of the day and keep abreast of their fathers and brothers on all the vital affairs of the nation. Therefore it is not surprising that out of the chat and gossip of a social gathering which had turned to the depression of the cotton market, the hoarding of gold and the buy-a-bale-of-cotton movement's slow progress, one of these, Miss Clark, should suggest that a big bargain sale in cotton ought to be held throughout the country and that if it were carried out and ten million women could be induced to each spend a dollar, some of the hoarded gold, $10,000,000 of it, would be brought out and put in circulation.

Miss Clark also suggested that while there were hundreds of people who could not afford to spend fifty dollars on a bale of cotton and then have to store it away somewhere for a while before they could hope to realize anything on it, there were few families that could not use from fifty cents to a dollar's worth of cotton household supplies.

From this chance remark, grew the great nation-wide bargain-sale movement in cotton, though at that time it was laughed at and considered unfeasible. However, business men and advertisers got hold of the plan that had been suggested, and newspapers started a great propaganda until the railroads, officials of boards of trade and chambers of commerce all united in pushing the scheme along. As the plan developed, with the support and endorsement of the parents of the originators, it was decided to hold a cotton style show to demonstrate the many uses of cotton as a dress fabric and its adaptability to any style. The girls went to work with their mothers, sisters, friends and relatives and set about designing, some of them actually making gowns to wear at this show. All of the wives of the Cabinet officers, Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice President, Mrs. McAdoo, Mrs. Champ Clark, Mrs. James R. Mann, wife of the minority leader of the house, Mrs. J. M. Henderson, Mrs. William Cummings Story, president general of the D. A. R., Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker, president general of the Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Duncan Fletcher, president of the Congressional Club, Mrs. Timothy Ansberry and Mrs. Martin Glyn of New York were among the patronesses.

One end of the handsome red parlor of the New Willard Hotel was given over exclusively to the gowns. A platform banked with tall palms, graceful ferns and huge bunches of autumn flowers formed a charming background for the score of figures draped with the exquisite cotton gowns designed for this display, while from the chandeliers, the cornices and every possible nook and corner festoons of cotton bolls were most artistically arranged. Against the red velvet of wall and floor coverings this was especially effective. Great baskets and potted cotton plants were in evidence everywhere and one of the most attractive tables contained a miniature freight car of the Southern railroad filled with bales of cotton billed to every section of the country.

Practically one long side of the big room was given over to the marvellous display from North Carolina, which was explained and presided over by Mrs. Josephus Daniels, wife of the Secretary of the Navy. Mrs. Daniels wore an exceedingly attractive gown of cotton cloth and velvet (cotton velvet) and exhibited another of her own designing which was greatly admired. The latter was of pale gray and rose pink cotton voile, most artisically combined and draped with sleeves and yoke of soft delicate cotton lace. From her native state Mrs. Daniels secured more than 1,000 articles of cotton, and never before were such exquisite blendings of colors or such fascinating silky effects in cotton fabrics seen at one time. Even the stars and stripes that hung above the center of the exhibit were of pure cotton, and certainly each star was as white and the union as true blue and each bar as "rose red and blood red" as any that are made of wool bunting or silk. Here every known article made of cotton from socks to blankets and window trimmings were displayed.

The booths that bordered the other walls of the room were equally interesting. One devoted entirely to children's garments, accessories and toys, was a perfect find to several women seeking for Christmas suggestions. Dolls, of the topsy-turvy variety, stuffed animals, crawling blankets, rattles, were some of the things besides the wearing apparel and Indian, cowboy, scout and policemen play suits that called for attention. But first, last and always, the visiting throngs, of whom there were ten thousand during the two days of the exhibit, gave their chief consideration to the gowns, there being about thirty of these on the platform and scattered about the room. Every one was the expression of careful thought and study, and left no doubt in the mind of the visitor that cotton material may be obtained in weaves delicate and dainty enough for party or dinner frocks, and sufficiently heavy and substantial for mild mid-winter and even cold weather if the plan of one of the enthusiastic women is used who declares that while the war lasts, she will wear cotton clothing under her furs, or with a chamois jacket beneath her cotton blouses.

MISS GENEVIEVE CLARK, MISS LUCY BURLESON, MISS CALLIE HOKE SMITH, WEARING COTTON GOWNS DESIGNED AND MADE BY THEMSELVES.

There were several evening and dinner dresses evolved out of cotton laces, mulls and crepes that seemed elaborate enough for any function if it was remembered that they were worn in the cause of patriotism. Many of the elderly ladies who gathered to comment over the gowns agreed that no girl ever could look half so lovely in silks, satins and velvets as in the sheer tarletans, mulls and organdies with their sashes and velvet girdles. Among the most attractive of the dresses, and which everyone wished to see, were those designed by the three young girls who initiated this movement. Miss Clark's gown was a simple pale pink crepe heavily hand embroidered in white, with little touches of black velvet (cotton) in the buttons and the girdle. This was so extremely dainty that it did not seem possible that every bit of it was cotton. Miss Clark has been requested to loan her dress to the organizers of the Red Cross Ball to be held in New York shortly. The plan is to copy it and raffle off the reproduction. For this same affair President Wilson has donated his bale of cotton to be disposed of in aid of this charity. New York women intend to help the sale of cotton and the Red Cross at the same time, for all the money realized from the ball is to be given to that organization to help extend its services in the war.

Miss Lucy Burleson exhibited an afternoon dress of hand embroidered muslin of finest texture, so sheer and soft that it might have been mistaken for handkerchief linen, while Miss Callie Hoke Smith's contribution was a unique street dress of a soft, leafy green material, with black edged pockets and rose-flowered net sleeves set off by a creamy lace front. One elaborate, canary-yellow Marquisette with accordion-plaited skirt, deep lace tunic and waist, was so charmingly made that a few feet away it was taken for the finest crepe de chine. The crowning touch to this gown was the narrow edging of black, made to imitate chenille, and the great bunch of violets with their gauzy streamers.

Mrs. Albert Sidney Burleson sent in a dress that was an object lesson in economy, since it was just the sort of a useful street dress that every woman needs for market, shopping and even country outings, and it cost only one dollar for the material. With it was the slip showing the cost of each item. It was of black and white check trimmed in green. The cost was:

Five yards check cotton	$ .55
One quarter yard green rep trimming	.10
One half yard white Marquisette	.15
Button molds	.02½
Two yards lace	.05
Collar wire	.02½
Buttons	.05
Hooks and eyes	.02½
Thread	.02½
Total.	$1.00

To describe them all would be too lengthy a proceeding, for there were all kinds including a golf skirt that could be duplicated for 85 cents, simple house dresses, morning, outdoor frocks, afternoon dresses and coat suits, of which one of the most charming came from Miss Sidney Burleson. This was a light tan, corded cloth, made extremely natty and stylish. With it was worn the most fetching cotton boll hat. Two of these hats were sent by Mrs. Beatrice Chrisbom of New York. In a recent competition of American designed millinery these hats (one of which was worn at the Cotton Style Show by Miss Clark) won the first prize of $100. They were made of raw cotton under white net with the pod and stem made of brown cotton velvet, and fit close to the head, the boll being inverted.

Dancing dresses, reception gowns, and evening gowns all of cotton, even the velvet girdles and the garlands of tiny flowers used in trimming, being of the same material, were shown to prove the feasibility of women wearing, for one season at least, gowns of cotton, and made sufficiently attractive for every purpose and suitable for every occasion, and at the same time popularizing a commodity, the general use of which will benefit the country at large.

The great interest the Cotton Style Show created was manifested not only by the large attendance that it attracted, but by the number of notable persons who visited it, among whom were President Wilson, his Cabinet and all the highest officials of the government, most of the members of Congress, representatives of great manufacturers, and heads of organizations of other cities who came to get pointers to follow out in conducting similar affairs.

Coincident with the Cotton Style Show, Miss Callie Hoke Smith offered three gold cash prizes to American school children under sixteen years of age who would send in the best 300 word essays on "The Cotton Plant and Its Uses." The first prize is $20, the second $10, and the third $5. All American school children both public and private school were eligible, the only condition imposed being that the essay be written and mailed during the week of the nation-wide

Cotton Bargain Sale set for October 5-12. When the Cotton Style Show closed at ten o'clock, Oct. 8th, 8,000 manuscripts had been received by the essay competition committee. A group of distinguished people have been asked to judge these essays among whom are former President Taft, Marion Harland, and Mrs. Thos. A. Edison.

Mrs. Champ Clark also offered a money prize to the children in the Speaker's congressional district in Missouri, and Mrs. Timothy Ansberry, wife of Representative Ansberry, made the same inducement to the children of Ohio to get busy and tell what they knew about cotton.

When Miss Clark was asked if her efforts and those of her friends had produced results that measured up to her expectations, she exclaimed: "Oh, we never dreamed of such phenomenal interest nor such universal co-operation all over the United States, though, that is just as it should be because, you see the cotton situation affected the entire country, not just the South alone.

"Our plan was really a part of the 'Buy-a-bale' project and the 'Made-in-America' movement, all of which had one primary object and that was to do something to change the stagnation in the cotton situation.

"You see," Miss Clark continued, "Europe usually buys from five to six hundred million dollars' worth of cotton from the United States annually. This amount, because of the war is, of course, thrown back upon the hands of the producers. And, it is especially to be deplored that this should happen this year when the crop of cotton is so large. This cotton deadlock has been the object of discussion from one end of the country to the other and has, as you know, resulted in the 'Buy-a-Bale' idea. But while this is a splendid movement, it is confined to the class of people who have ready money to invest. Our plan was simple enough, from the point of money involved, to include every family in the land because everybody has to use some cotton all of the time.

"Yes," added Miss Clark, "The Show was to demonstrate that cotton gowns could be made suitable for all purposes and it does seem that American women could wear cotton dresses for one season to help avert a financial depression which affects not only the prosperity of the South but reacts on the North as well.

"Certainly, it affects, the North, and the entire country," Miss Clark answered the query, positively. "If the South fails to sell her cotton, she cannot spend the four hundred million dollars with Northern manufacturers that she usually spends each year. All of the cotton factories of the country have reduced their output to about one half, which means that their force is reduced, leaving many people out of employment. This affects the merchant, because he will not order more supplies while his shelves are stacked full of bolts of goods unsold. So that by getting people to using and buying cotton all over the country, we start a movement that is financially beneficial all along the line from grower to factory owner, with all the people that have connection with their respective industries.

"Why, am I so interested?" Miss Clark answered the question with another, "Did you know that Missouri raises cotton regularly in twelve counties and that she could raise it profitably in as many as fifty counties? Did you know that Missouri took the first prize at the Chicago World's Fair for the best short staple cotton, per acre? Well then I have lots of kinsfolks in the and help one another. We should study our children, each one is a study in themselves. I try and help them in their school studies. We have quite a German class right here at home.

I do not agree with Grandma of Muncie, Ind. Children are to be reasoned with; they have more common sense than a good many grandmothers. They are to be handled very tenderly for they are like clay in the potter's hands and we should study them. They are great imitators and we, as parents, should look carefully to ourselves. We have to create a desire in the child for the best things. When he seeks pleasure and finds it he seeks it again. It soon gets to be a habit and "habit is ten times nature." Our virtues as well as our vices are habits. How important then that we should direct them in the right way.

I would like to hear from someone from Texas, Arizona and New Mexico about the climate, and products. My husband is talking about the South; he thinks there are more advantages there. What about Texas? I think Mexico after this war is settled will be the place. Who knows anything about it?

Thanking Mrs. Wilkinson for her kindness and favor in publishing this unworthy letter, I remain yours,

MRS. SIDILLA COOMBS.

Mrs. Coombs. You have found your gift, the greatest of all gifts and work—motherhood—and the rearing of your children to be useful men and women. Here is a good opportunity for you to organize a "Mother's Club" or something of that nature in your town or among your friends. Don't waste the time in idle gossip; in fact, make it one of the by-laws that no gossip be allowed, but instead study the needs of your children, and children in general, and the best way to overcome them. I wonder if some sister isn't already a member of such a club? If so, we should be glad to learn about it.—Ed.

EXPERIMENT, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a devoted reader of COMFORT for about ten years. Like all readers, I enjoy it from cover to cover, especially the COMFORT Sisters' Corner. The stories are all moral and uplifting, and fiction is all right, if we don't devour too much of it. I think in choosing food for our minds, we should use the same judgment as when feeding our bodies; use something nourishing and that requires diversification. We see so many girls, this day and age, who cram their minds with "chaffy" fiction and never consider good, moral literature or religious reading. The same applies to those interested in music. I have actually seen girls that were so-called Christians and good musicians, who could not play a hymn and never applied their talent to anything but ragtime music. Would, that each and everyone in this broad land, would gleam a lesson, a personal one, from that great parable. "The pounds and talents." Dedicate your talent to the service of Jesus Christ. Use your opportunity; you know not what God has in store for you. I would like to ask, dear readers, what is more like heaven on earth, than a Christian home? Have you the family altar established in your home? If not, why? You as the father and mother in the home, how do you expect God's blessing if you do not recognise Him as the Supreme Ruler? Let us not be ashamed to praise our Lord and give thanks unto Him daily. Oh, how many, many homes have I visited where people sat down to a table laden with the fat of the land and never once thought of the Giver. Why, we are not that discourteous with our friends. We accept their gifts in a thanksgiving manner.

Mrs. F. A. Wilson, I heartily endorse your theory, in regard to the punishment of the white slaver. It is hard indeed to restrain our anger and hatred, when speaking upon this vital subject. But "vengeance is mine," saith the Lord. "I will repay." I also think we should more freely distribute literature treating upon this subject, especially in the remote sections and isolated places. Read an article or book and pass it on. I have talked with girls in the last few months, who were perfectly innocent regarding white slavery. Do you not scringe for that girl if she should perchance visit the city? They are always on the lookout for the unfortunate country girl, who is seeking the brilliancy of the city. Mothers, make it your business, to enlighten your daughter along this line; don't be ashamed for you may wait until it is everlastingly too late, and then you can but curse your negligence and false modesty.

I was greatly interested in "Grandma's" letter in the September number and am very anxious to hear from others along that line and do wish our editor.—but she said she'd give her opinion later, so please give her the opportunity. Personally, I cannot comment, being in a state of single bliss, so my theory would not be given much weight, but by observation and experience we learn much.

Miss Bessie Gress, I am heartily in sympathy with you and your work, no one can sympathize with you but someone that has been through the mill. I have done most all kinds of farmwork, but I think, in shouldering those responsibilities we are laying the foundation for a strong character. I entered heartily in the business affairs of the home for twelve years. And like you I do not regret it, am not afraid of work. But people in general do not appreciate that type of girl. Too many young men like the society of the frivolous girl, who sits with a novel in her hand and gum in her mouth, while mother does the cooking and housework, but, alas, after marriage the tune too often changes. Usually the man in the case is poor in this world's goods and with the wife's ignorance of domestic duties and home economics, trouble ensues and the divorce court so often is obliged to settle the affair.

Some sister wrote that she was bringing her children up as nearly as she could in the image of Christ, teaching them to be Christians. That is good logic. But do not forget to teach them they are sinners; they cannot become Christians without experiencing the new birth and that cannot be without repentance and faith.

I am going to draw my letter to a close, as I hardly expect it worthy of publication. I am not going to describe this country as I have lived here only a short time, scarcely a year. My home was for thirteen years in northern Missouri, near Hannibal. My birth state was Kansas. Should be very glad to hear from any that care to write as I am fond of correspondence.

Long live COMFORT and dear Mrs. Wilkinson. May God bless you all is my prayer.

STELLA HOLCOMB.

THOMASVILLE, GA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoy your letters so much I have often wanted to write you but I'm dull when it comes to writing or talking to grown-ups. I feel so much that I cannot express. Give me the children, the dear, darling children! I never grow tired of them. I feel, sometimes, that I would like to take them all into my arms and shelter them from the many rough places in which their little feet may wander. They could miss many of these rough places, if we could only make them know, but it is natural for youth to rush ahead and not believe until they see.

I like to do fancy-work. I always look for something new when I get my COMFORT each month. I also draw and paint a little. There is only one objection I have to our dear old paper. I don't get it often enough. I would like to get one every week. I think it gives more comfort to me than to many others.

Our little town is called "The city of roses." Isn't that pretty? I love the roses. There is such a variety and, oh, they are all so lovely! I often wish I could send someone who loves flowers and has none, some of mine. They bring beautiful thoughts more than anything else unless it is the children. When I gaze upon a great white rose against a green background I put away narrow, sinful thoughts. There can be nothing but purity while I am with anything so pure. My soul stirs within me, longings, which I cannot express, come over me. Who can say there is no God when they feel like that? And so it is with all the others. I love to touch the crimson buds, but I do it reverently, for wasn't the great drops of blood that trickled from the Savior's brow, when he wore the crown of thorns, like these? And there are the thorns. The rose is wearing them meekly, without a murmur, as our Savior did. There is so much in nature I feel and see and love that I cannot express it. I hope you dear sisters are getting these lessons, too.

Love and best wishes for you Mrs. Wilkinson and everyone of the sisters.

MRS. MCREE.

DIXIE, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you kindly forgive me if I come again? It has been only a short time since I wrote you before (July number I believe), but so many have requested "another sermonette please," that I feel it my duty to comply with the best that I have. Sisters, my little sermonette in July COMFORT has done a world of good. Letters came from far and near, not only from the sisters but brothers also, and oh, how I enjoyed them all. I answered everyone of them. So many of these were from the poor, motherless and friendless, who said they "would like to reach across the continent and give me a hearty handshake for my plainly spoken words." Several of these letters were heart-rending, sisters. Oh, how my heart ached for them. They had fallen, then reformed and tried so faithfully to do what was right but there was no one to give a helping hand or speak one kind word. They were on the brink, wavering between right and wrong. I wrote these dear, little sisters giving them advice to the best of my knowledge and ability. Sisters listen! don't expect everything of a woman and nothing of a man. Really more should be expected of a man for he is of the stronger sex and was created by the All-Wise Father as a protector of the weaker sex. How often we hear of a man betraying an innocent girl just in her teens; the man as a rule is allowed to "run at large" while the poor girl must suffer the consequences. Her life is ruined, wherever she goes there is always someone to spread the news of her disgrace. We, as Christians, should make a vow to Almighty God to endeavor to equalize things, to either expect as much of man and to make him live up to the standard we expect of women or else close our eyes, ears and mouths to the similar faults of women. I wonder how many of the sisters will promise to do this?

When a man marries he seeks a wife who is the personification of purity and of all that is good and true, it makes no difference what he is or what he may have done. He makes the plea that the mother of his children must be virtuous for they would inherit her virtues. Sisters isn't it strange that our boys and girls can inherit a mother's virtues but never, no never, a father's. Strange that they can inherit a father's features, form and habits to a certain extent, but it makes no difference what he may have done in the way of virtue his child will never inherit it. Oh, sisters! how can we be so blind? Do you know that if we had more virtuous fathers we would have more virtuous sons and daughters? Men should be virtuous as God intended they should be. I would like to hear the opinions of some of the sisters in regard to this great work claiming our time and attention.

Now a few words to the younger sisters who are yet within the "home nest" safe with father and mother, and then I must close. Little sisters, remember that mother and father are your best friends, they will stand by you in sickness and health, poverty or riches. Always go to them for counsel and advice; they know what is best for you; they were young once themselves and have already had the experience and know of the snares and pitfalls which await you should you step out into the world alone. "Mother," sisters that is a sacred word to me. I never knew a mother's love, my dear mother having died when I was a mere child. How I have longed for her; I would see other girls whose mothers would wait upon them, in fact be a slave to that daughter and I would say: "Oh, that I had a mother to love and to love me!" Daughters love that mother, do all for her that lies within your power, after mother is dead and gone then what bitter tears of repentance you will shed, but it will be too late, you may buy the most costly flowers and heap them upon her coffin, you may grieve and mourn but it is too late, too late. You should have strewn those costly flowers in mother's pathway while here upon earth; you should have obeyed and reverenced mother while the golden opportunity lay before you, then these tears would not be one half so bitter, and not one half so hard to give that mother up.

"Grandma," the letter you wrote to COMFORT some time ago bears along this line I think. Parents are too prone in this day and age of the world to allow their boys and girls to "do as they please." When I was a girl, children had more respect for their parents. We should expect obedience from our children, if they are to grow up noble men and true women. When they arrive at the age of maturity they will then be under the laws of our nation and must obey them or we all know the consequences.

Sisters, and dear Mrs. Wilkinson, please forgive me for I have talked too long and am afraid you will not ask me to come again. Will all those who so kindly write me, enclose stamp; I wish to write to you all but so many write it is quite an expense.

Yours in Christ,

MRS. W. T. BARNES.

COMO, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As it will son be time for school to open, naturally one's thoughts turn to the great question of education. Much can be written about the district school. Texas is behind almost every other state in education, which means we and our children do not have the training and culture, therefore understanding, of the better things of life that others of our nearby states have. If "teacher" does one little thing wrong it is carried from tongue to tongue and sometimes enlarged like a really good act should be reported. Teachers have enough with the care of our dear little folks without an additional burden of disapproving parents. Instead let's see to the schoolroom being properly ventilated, without the fresh air having to slip through broken window panes, good stoves and not some second-hand one and baskets of properly prepared food. How can a child have its mind on its books when its stomach is full of fried meat and indigestible food? And perhaps those little feet are shod in ill-fitting shoes which are cold and uncomfortable. Do not make Sarah do the family washing on Friday afternoon, scrub and iron and do a week's work because we don't believe in "no sich carryin' ons as that thar new teacher is puttin' in Sarry's head, stamp her foot and yell at the top of her voice." Let her go ahead and learn elocution. It will do her more good than bending over the wash-tub and hearing, "Well, I'll jist declare you ain't worth yer salt since you'ns started to school. All ye want to do is to have yer nose pasted to that thar everlastin' book." Let's take a sensible view of the matter and place good literature and magazines before our children instead of trashy novels; make their environments elevating instead of using slang and low degrading gossip.

I would like to correspond with those interested in fancy-work and raising fowls as that is my hobby when the little ones are away at school. I have Pea fowls, White Leghorns and Columbian Wyandottes. I would like to know something of the care of Pheasants, White Guineas and Golden Opera Canaries, as I intend sometime in the future to try them.

One word I wish to say for our paper, I fail to comprehend how such a useful, practical and interesting paper can be published at such a low price as COMFORT. The name befits it exactly.

With best of wishes to you all,

MRS. A. E. FOSTER.

2514 Wilcox Ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years, and always have found it very interesting, especially Uncle Charlie's and the Sisters' Corner. I do enjoy reading the sisters' letters so much, and have been quite interested in the discussion which has been going on relating to country and city life. I have had experience in both and think some of the sisters are just a little too hard on the city. What Mrs. Brooks says in the October issue is true. Country people never stop to think of all our beautiful parks and all the other forms of amusement we have in the city. And living is not so bad either, we do not get old stale vegetables unless we take them. Vegetables are brought in every morning, very early by the surrounding farmers and truck gardeners to the markets, from where the retailers get them or the pedlers and by nine or ten o'clock we can get them, so you see they still are pretty fresh, of course it isn't exactly like going out into your garden and pulling them, but the vegetables taste about the same. Then we have no end of places to go to; there are the theaters, numerous amusement parks, bathing beaches, etc., to go to, most any kind of amusements. Of course I quite agree with the sisters that the country is much healthier, there is always quite a bit of sickness in a large town, but a person must consider there are so many people.

I was reared in Southern Missouri and you know that is quite a hilly country, being almost in the heart of the "Ozarks." I go down there most every summer and you can imagine how I enjoy going to see the home folks. Have made Chicago my home for the last eight years but it seems the older you get the more you think of your home and parents. Haven't many of the sisters found that true?

People talk so much of Colorado and the beautiful scenery out West, but do you know I think there is nothing to compare with the beautiful Ozark hills, with their dense forests and vegetation, beautiful flowers which bloom from March until October, and its many brooks and rivers. We were in Colorado last summer, of course the snow-capped mountains are very grand, but forest and vegetation is rather scarce; the mountains are mostly barren masses of rock and canyons. Give me an Ozark hill, that you can go up one side and down another; it surely is good exercise, sometimes when I think of how we children used to run around in those hills and hollows gathering berries and flowers during the summer and our winter supply of nuts in the fall, and the good times we had at our one-room schoolhouse it almost makes me wish for the old days again. Of course it wasn't all play as one on a farm well knows, but I think a country child has everything nicer than a city child who has only the street or a little yard to play in. How many of the sisters have read Harold B. Wright's book the "Shepherd of the Hills?" It is a true description of that country although it is not quite as rural now. Rose Cecil O'Neil, the noted artist and illustrator, is another "booster" for the Ozarks, as she has a beautiful home at Day, Mo., called "Bonnie Brook." It is located right in the wildest and roughest part, but unsurpassed for natural beauty.

They have built a large dam at Branson within the last few years. Have quite a large artificial lake which abounds in fish as do the rivers. It has become quite an amusement and summer resort.

As most of the sisters give their description, will try and give mine. Am five feet five inches in height, weigh one hundred and forty pounds, have fair hair and gray eyes, twenty-four years of age and have been married a little over a year.

In the letters I see many of the sisters get lonely at times, I guess we all get our share. I was always used to being with a bunch of girls before I was married; now when I am home all day alone, I get lonely sometimes, but I do quite a bit of fancy-work, then there are the matinees to go to, or shopping in the large department stores or visiting, all of which is attractive in a city.

How many of the sisters are interested in the European war? Isn't it terrible to think of all those civilized nations to plunge themselves into such an awful conflict? How many thousands of lives will be lost, the many billions of dollars it will cost, all the beautiful and historical cities that are being laid in ruins. It almost is beyond a human mind to conceive all the misery and woe that is being caused. All we can hope for is that it will soon come to an end, although at present the outlook isn't very bright.

Before I close I have a favor to ask. I planted some tomatoes this summer in our back yard, which is large, and sunny, but it seemed all the blossoms fell off, there are only four tomatoes on a dozen stalks. Can any of the sisters say what was the cause. It was same with the cucumbers, although flowers and some other things did all right. Do you think it was the soil? It is rather rich, but home we always put our garden in rich soil.

Well, Mrs. Wilkinson, I'm sure you think I have written enough so I will close, wishing you and COMFORT's staff all future success. Respectfully,

MRS. W. M. REYNOLDS.

Mrs. Reynolds. No the soil was not too rich. The trouble probably was lack of bees to carry the pollen from flower to flower and fertilize them, without which they are barren and will not fruit.—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

If you are going to be away from home for a few days or a week, try this plan for watering plants: Take a wash tub and place in it as many bricks as you have pots; put enough water in the tub to nearly cover the bricks and place the pots on them. The bricks will absorb the moisture and keep the plants in good condition.

Box shoe-blacking frequently becomes hard and crumbly before the contents of the box is used. Put the box on the back of the range and in a few minutes the heat will cause it to melt, forming a paste. When cold the contents of box will be of its original consistency.

Fine kid shoes will never crack if rubbed once a week with equal parts of Castor oil and glycerine.

Apply strong salt and water with a brush and rub the furniture until dry.

Instead of sweeping your stair carpet, try wiping it over with a damp cloth. Use a teaspoon of ammonia in two quarts of warm water and your carpet will look clean and bright and there will be no dust.

Wash and place the pods in boiling water, when they crack the peas will go to the bottom and the pods will float on the top.

When putting muslin curtains on a brass or wooden rod, first cover the end of the rod with the finger of an old glove. This will prevent the curtains tearing and also save time.

MRS. A. E. DAY, 1858 Chicago Ave., Chicago, Ill.

To remove fruit stains from the hands, rub them with the juice of a tomato.

Milk will not turn sour if a teaspoon of fine salt be added to every quart.

To make glassware clear and sparkling, add a little washing blue to the soap suds when washing.

One dessert spoon of Castor oil poured about the roots of a dying plant will most always revive it.

Remedies

MILK LEG.—Bathe the limb from waist to toe in as hot water as can be borne, until the pores are thoroughly opened; then bandage from hip to toe and soak in extract of witch hazel. Bathe the limb twice a day in the hot water and saturate the bandage three times a day with witch hazel. If one lives where the witch hazel grows, a strong tea, made of bark and leaves can be used as well. This has been known to effect a cure. MRS. ONUS TANNER, Frost, R. R. 2, Texas.

CURE FOR ECZEMA.—Get a five-cent bottle of vaseline and ten cents' worth of calomel, add one teaspoon of sulphur. Mix all together and bind on. It will effect a cure.

FOR SUMMER COMPLAINT IN CHILDREN.—Steep the common yard grass, or joint grass some call it, and let the child drink it.

MRS. JENNIE MINER, Ponca City, 240 Elm St., Okla.

One tablespoon of sulphur added to one pint of soft water will prevent hair from falling out.

Some Beauty Problems

I PRESUME a good many of my girls have yielded to the fad of the moment and cut a little lock of hair beside the ear to be trained into a Montague swirl. And, now, lo, and behold! The little curl which everybody cultivated so assiduously has fallen out of Fashion's favor, and the lock of hair we snipped so ruthlessly has converted itself into a problem.

What shall we do with it? And, alas! with the little down we find creeping down our cheek beneath it? We are just beginning to learn that we can't train the hair to lie on cheek or forehead, or fall over it, without starting a growth of hair beneath.

The first thing we must do is to devote as much time to training the hair away from the face as we did to manufacturing the bewitching

TRAINING BACK THE MONTAGUE CURL.

Montague. We used bandoline, no doubt, to plaster it to the cheek—suppose we use bandoline, now, to plaster it back? Here is the formula by which you can make a supply:

Quince Bandoline

Soak three teaspoonfuls of quince seeds in a pint of hot water for several hours. Then strain, and you will have a musilaginous liquid, to which you should add a couple of drops of perfume.

If you will moisten the hair with this, and brush it severely back at the ears, it will stay in place fairly well, although it may need a couple of applications of the bandoline during the day. If the little lock was a generous one, and your hair is inclined to be obstinate, you may have to resort to the mucilage brush, but this is to be avoided, if possible. Invisible pins will aid the bandoline tress to stay in place.

This same method may be applied wherever the hair has grown too low on forehead, neck, or cheek. It will check further growth, and gradually train the hair to grow away from the spot on which it has been encroaching. Now that it is fashionable to wear the hair high, the little locks in the nape of the neck can be kept in order by the bandoline brush, and if you wave the hair, it will stay in curl much longer if moistened with bandoline before being put up on kid curlers.

At night-time, you may use more drastic and unbecoming measures to train your tresses. Invest in a small package of court plaster, and before going to bed, brush the hair firmly back beside the ear, and paste in position with a strip of the court plaster. In the morning, this can be washed off easily with warm water, the little lock thoroughly dried and the bandoline applied.

The next task before you is to get rid of the patch of down which has almost certainly sprung up beneath your Montague. Get out your little bottles of peroxide and ammonia, and, dampening your fingers with one, thoroughly moisten the offending spot. The next day, use the ammonia in the same manner, and continue for several weeks. Peroxide can also be used for short hairs that grow low in the neck; and because it bleaches them, will render them less conspicuous. You must be extremely careful, however, not to let the tiniest drop touch the edges of the hair proper, or this, too, will bleach, and you will suddenly become—perhaps—the possessor of brown tresses with blonde roots.

Your investment in court-plaster you can turn to good account in many ways. It is very useful with which to cap an offending isolated pimple, but be sure to choose black for this purpose. Black suggests an old-fashioned beauty patch, while flesh-colored court-plaster is unpleasantly suggestive of a scab.

These tiny black patches serve to accentuate a dimple which isn't quite pronounced enough to suit its possessor—for this purpose, one should be placed just beside the dimple. It may be cut in crescent shape, star-shaped, in the fashion some ultra-modern young women affect, or it may be just a tiny black circle.

It was quite the fad last winter at opera or theater, where somewhat low-cut gowns were worn, to attach a little black patch to the shoulder, thus accenting the whiteness of the skin. But, probably most of my girls wear sweet modest little Dutch necks—I hope they do—and have no use for this art of the toilet.

Possibly, however, there may be one or two who will be interested in another very practical purpose to which that package of court-plaster may be put.

If Polly is inclined to be just a little near-sighted and so frowns a trifle when she reads, thus adding a vertical line or two to her smooth young forehead; or, if Janet has a rather hasty temper and is getting some temper lines just above her brows; or if patient little Ruth, who is sick so much, finds that Pain has left a crease or two behind, then out may come the court-plaster packet. With a pair of sharp scissors, little strips and squares of the plaster may be cut, the wrinkled skin smoothed out, stretched to its utmost between the first finger and thumb of the left hand, while the right hand claps a strip of dampened plaster right across it.

Wherever you find a wrinkle or the hint of one, clap down one of your plaster strips. Of course, these are not to be worn in the daytime, but may be generously applied at night, and kept on till morning. Then warm water and soap will wash them away, and you should rub in a little skin food, massaging across the lines, not in the direction they run.

If you will be diligent and faithful in your allegiance to court-plaster and bandoline, peroxide and ammonia, I shall expect to hear great tales of the improvement in your appearance before next month.

Answers to Questions

A Mere Man.—How very kind of you to let me know the method by which you so successfully increased your weight. I shall be very glad to recommend an egg beaten in a pint of milk, to be taken before breakfast each morning. That you have succeeded in gaining twenty-five pounds in six months, although being obliged to eat in lunchrooms and restaurants speaks well for what the egg and milk have done for you. I notice you are careful to eat rather light meals, which is an excellent plan if there is any trouble with the digestion. Thank you again for your very helpful letter.

Blanche F.—Anybody can be a member of our Pretty Girls' Club. This merely means that you will try to follow the advice I give in this department, pass it along to your friends, and do your best to be as pretty and happy and healthy as we were all intended to be.

Madge.—Your picture shows a very attractive girl. If you were not so careful as you say about your diet, I should think the pimples were caused by the food you ate, but you say you avoid pies, cakes, candy and fried foods. I suppose you are careful to drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, are you not? You must be sure that the eliminative functions of the body are in good working order. This is absolutely essential. See to this daily. After you scrub your face at night with hot soapy water, are you careful to rinse it in warm water several times, so that there cannot remain a particle of the soap? I think it would be a good idea to use warm (not hot) water instead of cold, in the morning for your face, without soap, afterward dashing on cold water. Before applying powder at any time, rub a little cold cream into the skin. See that it is all absorbed, and wipe off the surface of the face gently with a soft cloth before applying the powder. Can you not manage to take a bath every night before retiring?

White County, Arkansas.—The health of the hair depends considerably upon the health of the body. You must keep yourself very well nourished, and drink plenty of water. Eat a good many fresh fruits and green vegetables. I think the best thing for your hair would be to massage the scalp nightly. To do this, place the thumbs upon the temples and rest the four fingers of each hand on the scalp. Now, without lifting the fingers, move the scalp back and forth on the skull. You may find that your scalp is quite firmly attached, and does not wish to move, but keep right at it; for unless the skin is loose on the skull, your hair will not be healthy. Pay particular attention to the thin spot of which you speak. Use a little vaseline on the fingers. Shampoo your hair once in three weeks, not oftener; and the night before shampooing annoint the whole scalp with olive oil slightly warmed. Do your hair up in a towel afterwards. This will loosen the dandruff or scales, and make the shampoo in the morning effectual. You teach during the week, but if you could, on Saturday and Sunday, rub vaseline into your entire scalp, parting the hair first in one place and then in another to make it easy to apply the vaseline, it would be an excellent thing for your scalp. This would mean, of course, that you would have to shampoo it every week before you went back to school. The scalp massage is the best thing for you, however. You can change the position of the fingers every few moments until every part of the scalp is massaged. Do not rub the fingers back and forth across the hair, as this breaks the hair. Keep them in exactly the same position on the scalp, but move the scalp.

A Young Mother.—Gentle massage of the tiny scar on your daughter's forehead will help remove it, but in any case it will probably disappear as she grows older. Such a little "dimple" is often considered a desirable beauty mark, so I should not worry about it. Use cold cream on your fingers in massaging, and massage across and not lengthwise of the mark.

Inquirer.—Your hair is extremely pretty. It is brown with chestnut shades. Do not try to make it all the same color; this little tinge of chestnut is considered quite attractive. If you find dandruff coming, see what I said to "White County, Arkansas," and use olive oil the night before shampooing.

Curly Head.—No. Buttermilk will not grow hair on the face. Taken internally it is excellent for the complexion. Your hair is a light brown with a golden tinge. You should shampoo it every three weeks, being careful that it is rinsed thoroughly and dried in the sun. If it reaches to your waist, it is a very good length, indeed, for a girl of seventeen years. Your handwriting is very good indeed.

Gemma.—The only formulas I possess for liquid face powders contain bichloride of mercury, and this is such a deadly poison that I do not like to give out the formulas. The application of a liquid powder is a very delicate thing; and if the tiniest pin-point of the skin is not covered, the whole face looks artificial. Use a good cold cream and dust powder on the skin. If you wish to use a liquid rouge, dissolve pure rouge (carthamine) in alcohol and add a tiny bit of acetic acid. Apply with a bit of absorbent cotton, after using cold cream and before applying powder.

Smiling Eighteen.—Don't lessen the amount of water you are drinking for any reason. Drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, but do not drink any liquid at your meals. For your hands and arms, scrub them every night with hot soapy water and a complexion brush; in the daytime, except when they are very dirty, use tiny cheese-cloth bags of rolled oats instead of soap. Dip the little bag (about three inches square) into warm water and then use it as a wash cloth. At night use the following arm-and-hand bleach:

Bleach for the Arms

Beat the yolk of one egg until fluffy, then add twenty drops of tincture of benzoin, one teaspoonful of olive oil, half an ounce each of glycerine and rose-water, and add enough flour to make a thick paste.

When the arms have been covered with this dainty bleach, wind around them long strips of cotton cloth, fastening ends securely. Do not remove bandage until morning comes. Slip very loose cotton gloves over the hands.

Dorothy.—Fill the hollows at the base of the neck with cold cream, and massage the lower line of the throat until the cream is all absorbed. Also practise the following exercise:

Take a correct standing position, and alternately turn the head slowly to the right and left as far as possible, keeping the muscles of the neck rigid.

Here is a formula for the sachet powder which you wanted:

Violet Sachet

Ground orris root, one half pound; ground rose leaves, one eighth pound; ground rhodium wood, one eighth pound.

I should not brush orris root into the hair. A dry shampoo of this kind should only be used in emergencies, as it is apt to clog the scalp and bring about unhealthy conditions. Here is a formula for a face bleach:

A TINY PATCH TO ACCENTUATE A DIMPLE.

Buy a fifty-cent jar of theatrical cream and a pound of almond meal. Beat together one teaspoonful of the cream and some of the almond meal and add enough hot water to form a thin spreading paste. Cut two squares of thin cheese-cloth big enough to cover the face, and tear a hole in the center of each for your nose, so you won't smother. Now, dampen the squares and spread the paste between them. Bathe the face in hot soapy water, massage a minute, and then apply the pack, patting it down so it touches the face all over. Now lay on two medium-sized, hot, wet Turkish towels; and, as soon as they cool, replace with others. Keep this up for fifteen minutes, then remove pack, wash face in warm water, then cool, then very cold water. Take two or three treatments every seven days for three weeks. If your nose and cheeks get so red, your circulation is impeded. See that your clothes are loose, both around the waist and neck, and never wear tight sleeves. To improve your circulation, practise the exercise given to "Schoolmarm" for fat feet.

South as well as friends and I feel that the splendid example of the women of international fame who have given up careers and ease and comfort to go back to their native countries and show their patriotism by helping nurse the sick and wounded soldiers should find a response among the women of America who should at least endeavor to help even in a small way when a crisis like this arises that threatens the prosperity of such a large section. Patriotism isn't worth much unless it is practical," she added with a smile, "and now that cotton has had such a good start it is to be hoped, and I believe, that the use of cotton will become so universal that we will be able to use up a large part if not all of our surplus here in our own country.

At any rate, the cotton boom has begun and there is to be a number of Cotton Balls in the different cities which will further the cause. Washington is to have two, very soon, at which we will all wear our cotton gowns. Just now we are busy figuring out a winter wardrobe in cotton materials."

Miss Lucy Burleson declares that the wearing of cotton gowns and making American goods and American styles for American women the decree of fashion is a small service to render in the name of Patriotism when abroad so many women are called upon to give up everything life holds dear. She is certain that American women can make any project successful if they want to and points to the Cotton Style Show and the Bargain Sale week as an example which should be only the starting point in the work along the line to popularize cotton goods and that there is no good reason why the use of cotton should not be persistently continued as long as conditions limit the market. Through the schools much could be done to promote the general use of it, and much of Christmas giving might be figured out in cotton articles.

Few people really know just how large a part cotton plays in the necessities and comforts of every-day life. Since the cotton boom started and has drawn attention to this product of the South more has been learned as to the extent to which this article is used than was ever before realized. Though the European war demoralized the cotton industry, without cotton the war could not either have started, or having started, could not continue, for the simple reason that not a single modern gun could be fired without cotton, not a single battleship be able to sail nor any of the armies of Europe be put into motion. Cotton is the basis of smokeless powder now universally used, and of the high explosives. The armor-clad warship carries more cotton than was used by the frigates of a hundred years ago with all their array of sails. All the armies of the world now use cotton for their uniforms, in fact all of the people of the world from the tropics to the poles use cotton, for the Hottentot stretches a few breadths of cotton cloth over some poles and makes a shield from the sun, while the arctic explorer takes his duck suit, pads it nicely with cotton and does away with the weight of his furs, but none of the warmth.

Though many people insist upon wearing woolen clothing, it is a question whether they really get all wool or not, for so skillful have become the manufacturers of fabrics and textiles that to actually make sure a garment is all wool one would have to boil it in caustic soda.

Cotton enters into the composition of many articles outside of wearing apparel. There are cotton combs, for celluloid combs are really made of cotton treated with acids, and so are all celluloid articles, and their name is legion, made from the same product. Cotton is part of the structure of automobiles, for it is in the soft felt cushions, and the costly tires that puncture so readily and at such inopportune times are cotton treated with rubber.

Coal could not be mined without cotton. In the production of electricity, and the making of passenger coaches, cotton plays an important part. Big office buildings could not be put up without cotton, for there would be no fireproofing practicable; and for the carrying of cement 180,000,000 yards of cotton cloth are used every year for the bags that hold it.

Mr. C. T. Revere, the cotton expert, vouches for these facts and many more, and he knows, that cotton is a part of enamelled ceilings, that one company alone requires one million yards of cotton cloth each year to shade their tobacco plants, on plantations in Cuba and Florida, and 4,000,000 yards to make the little bags in which the tobacco is sold to the smoker.

From Mr. Revere's figures, it is evident that cotton is everything to everybody, playing a conspicuous part in housing and clothing us, and, as cotton-seed oil and its products, even finding its way into the larder to shorten our pastry when hog lard is either too high, too scarce or not popular with the cook.

Should anyone doubt that this is the age of cotton, the following figures should be more than convincing. The stopping of the looms and spindles would not be the greatest loss consequent on the elimination of cotton, for there are numberless other industries that would be paralyzed.

The total of the world's consumption of cotton last year was more than 19,000,000 bales. To many people to whom cotton is summed up in pillow cases, sheets and dress goods, the fact that these articles use up a comparatively small proportion of this material would doubtless cause a surprise. The railroads and trolley lines of this country alone, use more than 250,000 bales of cotton yearly for making enamelled ceilings, plush chairs, leather seats and airbrake hose.

The automobile consumes about 400,000 bales, annually most of which is made into cotton duck, the essential features for tires, and the balance into leather cushions and seats. The great harvester machine company is the largest individual purchaser of cotton, as it uses millions of yards of cotton-duck; the amount for the entire industry being estimated at fifty million yards yearly. Ordinarily in New York alone, 400,000 pounds of cotton yarn is used weekly in the electrical industry where it is utilized in insulation.

Many articles are now put up in cotton bags, as with cotton at fifteen cents a pound, they are cheaper than barrels.

Coal, too, is being put in duck bags or sacks for delivery where chutes are not feasible of use, and for this 15,000,000 yards of duck are bought. In coal mines cotton duck is used extensively for ventilating chutes, and cotton tarpaulins have come to be a universal covering for flat cars, vans and wagons.

The cotton blanket is rapidly driving out the woolen one. The delicate tints, plaids and stripes are attractive enough to please the most esthetic taste while their soft and downy surface is quite as appealing as that of the wool ones.

Twenty million yards of cotton duck find their way into the Canadian northwest each year for overcoats, replacing furs. With a padding of cotton between layers of duck, they are warmer and not so heavy to carry as the fur ones.

Cotton cloth takes the place of wall paper in many homes, and cotton buckram is used for the bindings of books. The government uses millions of yards of cotton duck for coin bags, and millions of yards go into feed bags for horses, and millions of yards are used for filtering oil, in the space of twelve months.

Potteries use great quantities for extracting water from clay, and fifty million yards go into cotton ducking for rubber belting and rubber hose.

The same material goes into the composition of gauntlets, gloves, leggings and tennis and gymnasium shoes, canopies for shower baths in place of rubber, coverings for trunks and telescopes, and 4,000,000 yards each year find their way into mines for draining purposes.

Countless yards are cut up into wagon tops, cushions and waterproof coats, tents, awnings, furniture making, floor coverings, etc. Mattresses too are being made of cotton felt and largely replacing those of hair.

In wood pulp and all paper mills, cotton is greatly in evidence for driers.

Most of our so-called household linen is cotton.

In the face of this marshalling of statistics of usefulness of cotton no one can plead a disinterest in the cotton situation, and with a little enlightening as to the many splendid substitutes for other fabrics which cotton can supply, which is emphasized by the world-wide attention which the war has attracted to the cotton industry of our land, America alone should be able and glad to make use of her cotton surplus for her own use.

The movement has been given a further impetus by President Wilson urging other cities to duplicate the Washington Cotton Style Show in the following message:

"The various movements to relieve the situation of the cotton growers, hard hit by war conditions in Europe, afford fresh proof of the American spirit of helpfulness. The exhibit of cotton goods in Washington this week opened the eyes of many to the growing uses of cotton. It is gratifying that patriotic women of other cities in our country are planning to follow the good example of Washington women and make like exhibits in their home cities. Such displays must have the effect of increasing the demand and opening new fields for the use of the fleecy staple, and are therefore to be warmly commended."

So also, the Daughters of the American Revolution have passed a resolution to wear cotton dresses, to increase the demand, and also to scorn all hats with foreign labels, and to use cotton decorations whenever possible. In line with this are the plans of the various clubs and societies for the organization of committees to arrange for "Muslin Balls" and "Cotton Balls" with prizes to be given for the handsomest and most unique cotton gowns.

Already from some of the states, word has come to Miss Clark that her efforts in starting the Cotton Bargain Sales Week has been productive of such a demand that shelves overstocked with cotton goods have been so depleted that orders have already gone to the factories for new supplies.

Who, now, would ever say that American girls and women have not their full share of patriotism?

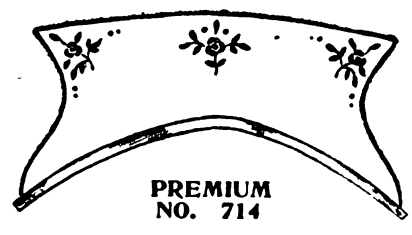
HOME WORK
Money Making for Women



I publish a book showing how women can establish themselves to do ladies' and children's hair dressing, marcel waving, manicuring, facial massage and beauty culture.

Women who were almost in despair at drudgery are now earning good incomes by pleasant work at home or visiting customers at their residences.

I will send my beautiful, illustrated book with much valuable information FREE, postpaid, to any woman, between 16 and 60 years, who writes me. Don't miss this.

Dress or Coat Collar

PREMIUM NO. 714

THE new style high hair dressing demands that the collars stand very high at the back to cover the long neck line and roll away in the front. We illustrate such a collar here and it is one of the most popular designs because it is so simple and requires very little time and labor to embroider. The material is fine lawn and there is enough of it so that it can be made double as it should be to lend the required stiffness. In making this collar you should use the solid and outline stitch. We include free a sufficient quantity of white embroidery cotton for working. You can secure this collar by accepting one of the following offers.

Offer No. 714A. For one new 15-month subscription to COMFORT at 25 cents, we will send you this collar with embroidery cotton to work either free and postpaid.

Offer No. 714B. For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) you get this collar and embroidery cotton free and postpaid. Premium No. 714.

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

With the Boy Scouts—Chivalry

CHIVALRY is a rather ancient word and has lost some of the glamour of its earlier significance. Gone alas, are the knights of old and with them the stirring deeds of valor done for ladies fair in distress, and the tilting matches, and the wild-brimmed, sweeping hats and the shiny swords and all the picturesqueness of olden days. In good king Arthur's time this worthy band of youth and pluck and high ideals flourished, but it must be stated, that the qualities, in which they seemed to excel had always existed in the hearts of brave and true men.

History tells us that about 1500 years ago the noble order of knighthood and chivalry sprung up in Europe. It was composed of men who loved fairness and justice, and their purpose in organizing was to defend the weak against the cruelty and oppression of roughs and bullies.

At this time the people were divided into two great classes, the aristocrats or nobles, and the plebians or common, hard-working folks. The former class, being supported by the toil of others, were rich and powerful and in a great measure idle and vicious. As a consequence their weaker brothers suffered nearly every kind of wrong and indignity at their hands. Now, in those days, while might was generally considered right, and it was the accepted idea that the prerogative of the rich and so-called nobles was to do as they pleased to the plebians, not all of them were brutal enough to act inhumanly toward the under class. In fact some of them stoutly objected to the gross wrongs perpetrated by ruffians of high caste and decided to put an end to them.

Noblemen, indeed, were those men, for observe, they were not banding together for their own protection but to help the weak and oppressed. Their slogan was, "To live pure, speak true, right wrong, and follow the king," and this, I think is a precise and adequate definition of the word "Chivalry." Of course, nowadays we will want to cut out the "king" part of it, but it is easy to put in the world "Lord," instead. There is no finer formula for a life of service than this same amended slogan, and of course you know, that every successful life is preeminently one of service.

In our time we do not have to battle with robbers and wild animals and savages to win a place in the ranks of chivalry. The more I think of the matter the more I am convinced that plain politeness and courtesy and common decency are all we need. To be truly chivalrous one must be imbued with a strong desire to make others comfortable and happy at all times. The Boy Scout motto, "Do a good turn daily," is a splendid rule of conduct to live up to.

However in practising the little amenities of life there is a line over which we must not step. The true gentleman is never over mannered or obtrusive. If he performs an act of kindness, he does it as quietly as possible. His object is never to display his own good qualities but always to put someone else at ease or help them out of a difficulty. He does it naturally, freely and unconsciously, without flourish or bombast or ostentation. The very essence of good breeding is to be polite in the least noticeable way. The great Lord Chesterfield, who is the world's authority on matters of etiquette sums it up admirably in this sentence, "Virtue itself offends, if coupled with forbidding manners."

Did you ever notice a difference in the way boys tip their hats to ladies? Some do it grudgingly, merely plucking at the headpiece, as if it were a crime to take it off; others apparently, want to show how very much they really do know, and almost sweep the ground with a grandiose gesture. Of course you cannot admire either of these extremes so you will choose the middle ground. Cut out the stage stuff. It is false and unreal. Take your hat entirely off, if it be possible, when you meet a lady and put it back on your head as slowly as you took it off. Even if you are ten feet ahead of the person saluted, before your head is again covered, where's the harm? Learn to do it gracefully. A bit of practise before a mirror will not be amiss.

Doff your hat impartially to all ladies of your acquaintance, even your next-door neighbors and the members of your own family when you meet them on the street or away from home. Remember the old like to be made much of as well as the young. Call an elderly person by his or her full name that is surname when you address them, and they will think a lot more of you for it. Surely, "Good morning, Mrs. Brown," accompanied by a proper baring of the head, and a frank, pleasant smile, is a whole heap better than a sidelong look and a curt "Hullo." The art of meeting people properly is well worth attaining for it may be the foundation of a successful career. You can certainly acquire it by constant practise and genuine interest.

Now acts of courtesy in nearly every case involve the foregoing of some of your own pleasure. Would it not be a grand old world if each of us would strive a little to make others happy?

Once I had the unusual experience of seeing the entire youthful population of a big city on its good behavior. It was nearing the Fourth of July and the mayor, who was a great and noted man, lay sick in bed. Over the city sped the word that the noise of fireworks and guns might retard his recovery or even cause a relapse from which he could scarcely hope to rally, and the people, by common consent, refrained from their annual practise of frolic and noisy glee. On the evening of the Fourth the city was as quiet as if it were mid-winter. Not a shot was heard, not a rocket lit up the sky. The invalid noted it and from his bed of pain he gave forth the message, "It is not my wish that anything should curtail the children's pleasure one whit, and yet this silence is sweet music to my ears, because it proves that the American youth can be truly kind and chivalrous."

Unfortunately, a few days afterward, the good man passed away, but this one quiet observance of the national holiday was so noticeably free from accidents and fires and fights, that it grew into a nation-wide campaign for a sane Fourth. I am firmly of the belief that although the self-sacrificing lads did not save the mayor's life by their chivalrous conduct on that first sane Fourth, that since then hundreds of lives and imeasurable suffering have been saved by the good practise they started.

Every Boy Scout is a true respector of others' rights. Protecting the weak does not always mean doing some heroic deed at great personal risk. Sometimes, as in the case cited, it is best accomplished, by an omission instead of an act. There is no set rule for chivalrous conduct. It is just a case of acting on your best impulses. At all times it requires courage, but courage itself is a hard quality to define.

It is the good we are trying to do that counts. If Chivalry is to be measured at all it must be by this standard. Some great thinker said, "Courage is not the absence of fear but the conquest of it." It takes a fine bit of courage to apologize for a wrong we have done to someone and yet it would be cowardly to refuse to do so.

The true gentleman always thinks of others before himself. Here is an incident that I was a witness of the other day. A dozen husky, young football players just from the field of practise boarded a street car with much loud laughter and shouting and jostling. As there were no women on the car, they continued to sing and give their class yell after they were seated. When the merriment was at its height a woman with a sleeping infant on her arm got on the car. One of the boys gave up his seat to her and from the instant she entered until she got off not a bit of noise was made. Perhaps it is a bit unchivalrous for me to add that the woman was colored and quite poorly clad.

Another instance comes to my mind. On the way to school when I was a lad was a hollow in which a very old woman lived. Grandma Baggs was her nick-name and each day some of us used to go down the rickety steps to do chores for her, the girls to sweep or wash the dishes or bring her hot soup or dainties, the boys to chop wood or shovel snow or carry water. Not for worlds would anyone harm the old lady and woe be to any strange lad who happened to throw snowballs at her door.

At the side of her little cabin was one lone walnut tree. It was a big one though, and seemed to have more nuts on it than any tree I can recall. This tree was in the heart of a thickly settled neighborhood and there was not another nut tree within miles of it. It was quite a temptation to go down and steal a few walnuts, but I do not think any boy ever did. The old lady sold the annual crop and the money received was her only source of income. The school boys gathered them for her and shucked them and put them on the low roof to dry and when she did try to force some on us we always snuggled them back into the basket. It was an absolute disgrace to have a walnut in your possession until after Grandma Baggs's crop was gathered and sold.

Ever since those days I feel as if I should help an old lady the very minute I see one, thanks to the early habit of doing chores for old Mrs. ——, well to tell you the truth, I never did know her right name. I think nothing could be finer than for a boy to voluntarily be of service to an aged person. It is a mark of good Scoutdom and the soul of Chivalry. Practise it whenever you get a chance and see what a real pleasure it is.

The great war now raging has brought out the inherent bravery and chivalry of the foreign Boy Scouts. In all the countries they sprang to the call of duty as one man. In eighths and double eighths they spend the long dreary nights guarding railroads, bridges and culverts. War service, it is, to be sure, and yet they are peace Scouts, acting in strict accordance with the tenets of the organization, for it certainly is a good turn to the helpless passengers to see that no harm comes to them while they are traveling. The Scouts are not out to injure anyone and do not carry guns, their duty is simply to spread alarm if needs be and and to stop endangered trains by signaling. It is not very easy duty either and I think it comes squarely under the heading of Chivalry. Spending a few nights in a forest is all right in fine weather, but after a week of it is apt to become irksome. Then it is discovered whether the boys are just showy and brave on the surface or have real grit. When the war is over, I have no doubt that hundreds of brave acts now being performed by them will come to light.

History describes many chivalrous deeds done by boys. A fine example of fortitude coupled with extreme courage is that of the French lad who carried to Napoleon the joyful news that his soldiers had taken a town that was being besieged. "You are wounded," said the emperor, noticing the lad's paleness and tightly closed lips. "Not wounded, sire but killed," was the answer, as the youth fell in a dead heap at the feet of the conqueror of nations. The greatest mistake a boy can make is to imagine that the exercise of mere physical strength constitutes bravery. It certainly does not, and invaluable as it is, it must be used to help and uplift and not to harm and destroy. Never strike a weak or innocent person. The bully is always a coward. He seeks the adulation of the crowd and in his heart is petty, mean and low-spirited. I can recall a half-dozen boys who were gang leaders and brutal fist fighters when I was a youngster, and not one of them amounts to a row of pins today.

Victory gained by sheer force or by ruthlessly trampling on the rights of others is worse than defeat. In the animal kingdom the big devour the little but we have souls and do not wish to be put on a level with a bulldog or a shark or a tiger.

Some boys take delight in teasing and making fun of the weak and crippled and deformed. Once I saw a young brute pull the coat-tail of a drunken man to gain the plaudits of the gang he was with. Urged on by the cheers and laughter of his equally brutal companions, he went a little too far and the helpless inebriate was thrown forward, sustaining a deep cut on the forehead. At sight of the blood the tormentors ran, the erstwhile brave leader dashing into a woodshed and cowering there like a whipped cur. How quickly the threatened danger to himself brought out the weakness of his character. It was a different sort of a lad who picked up the injured man and helped him to his home. The latter was a natural born Boy Scout and exemplar of Chivalry; the former and all like him should get into the Scouts and learn to apply their excess animal spirits in a good direction.

God is just and surely meant that the strong should protect the weak, or else it seems to me He would have made us all of equal strength. Chivalry is Christian knighthood. The keynote of Christianity is the golden rule. "Do to others as you would have them do to you." In spite of all this men are prone to take advantage of their brothers. Modern writers frequently ask this question, "Is Chivalry dead?" It is within the power of the boys of today to make their generation more chivalrous than any which preceded it.

The trend of events seems to indicate that America must take the lead in eliminating the horror of war from the world, as well as other forms of injustice. To do this she will need men, alive with a strong desire to assist the weak, regardless of what sacrifice may be involved. The Boy Scouts' organization is a preparatory school in the making of such a race. The members are sworn to do good at all times, and are fitted by training to act properly in every emergency that human brains can anticipate. The mock hero of cheap literature or cheaper picture drama is not the kind the Scout is taught to emulate. Our chivalry consists in doing properly the little things that are closest to us. Big, showy deeds of bravery are usually done on the impulse of the moment and are not always true indications of character. Politeness, cheerfulness, courtesy and fairness can be used all day long, even in our most trivial affairs. Each and every one of those qualities, we all possess to some degree, but we must amplify and enlarge them. All it requires is a willingness on your part. Common sense will teach you ways and means. If you could but foresee what a big advantage it will be in the shaping of a successful career, you would begin at once to practise the art of making life pleasant for others. No one can tell you just what to do, because your life is different from any other. "Do a good turn daily," is a good guiding motto for all boys as well as Scouts, but make it ten or a hundred good turns every day if the chance comes your way. No. "Chivalry is not dead." It has been neglected for a little while but it is coming to life stronger than ever. There is always a bumper crop after the soil has lain fallow for a few years.

Hearts and Wires

thrilled old Mrs. Fife's ear like a harp-string. She listened entranced whenever Jessie spoke.

"It seems to me," she said, "That you ought to be able to sing with that voice."

Jessie laughed, shook her head.

"I've never tried to sing or thought I could. I'm afraid there's not a bit of music in me. It seems strange, too, for mother used to sing very sweetly. She sang in the drawing-rooms of wealthy people until she married father. Then I came and her voice went." She touched her mother's needle-worn hand tenderly and her lingering glance was like a beautiful caress.

Old Mrs. Fife had suddenly a great deal of color. She let her fork fall with a rattle.

"It is a pity about the voice," she said. "And yet I daresay your mother feels it no sacrifice when she considers her daughter's."

Little Mrs. Carr's eyes shone through tears.

"As if all the voices in the world could be worth her little finger," she cried.

Old Mrs. Fife gave the signal to rise. This time she made the journey from the breakfast-room to the winged chair more comfortably than she had ever made it before. She had her arm through Jessie's. And Jessie had a way of offering herself more as a comrade than a young prop to a failing old stem. Therefore it was that Mrs. Fife said strangely:

"When your mother named you she gave you my name which is Jessie also."

"Oh, mother didn't name me. It was my father who did that!" cried Jessie.

Presently Mrs. Fife sat alone. They had gone and the house was still about her. She sat quietly thinking. It was then Gwendoline Provost came.

There was a light, fine snow falling and Gwendoline's sables glistened with the tiny crystals as she entered. Gwendoline was large and fair and sables became her. Her cheek was fragrant and cold as she kissed old Mrs. Fife dutifully.

"I had to come and see you after all," she said. "I've something to tell you."

"Sit down and tell me," invited old Mrs. Fife.

Gwendoline sat down where Jessie had sat twenty minutes before. What a different picture she made! She loosened her furs and a jewel gave off blue rays at her throat.

"Well," she said. "You won't think it pleasant perhaps. But I heard tonight that Fife's widow lives here in this town."

"So?" said old Mrs. Fife.

"Yes. And she has a daughter who works in the telephone office. Can you believe it?"

"Certainly. I can believe anything at my age. What name do they go by?"

"They call themselves Carr. It seems that after Fife died his wife married again. A man named Carr. He died immediately. There, you have it all just as I heard it."

"You heard it correctly," said old Mrs. Fife slowly. "I know the facts myself. Mrs. Carr is my sewing-woman. She has been here today. Her daughter, too. They had supper with me."

"What!" cried Gwendoline.

"And she wasn't a cheap actress, nothing of the sort," Mrs. Fife went on. "She sang in drawing-rooms. It was so Fife met her. The girl is named after me. She is an adorable child."

"Well!" gasped Gwendoline.

"They don't know yet that I'm related to them. Fife never told his wife anything. But I intend they shall know. And I mean to do something for the girl, Gwendoline."

Fife's daughter," Gwendoline said. She looked away. A tear rolled down her cheek and got caught in the glossy hairs of her sable scarf. "But you can't do it all, you know," she added quietly. "I've got my claim upon her, too. Fife was the only man I ever loved. And his daughter is—— his daughter."

"Gwendoline Provost!" cried old Mrs. Fife. "Why I never was so surprised in my life. At heart you are a fine, generous woman. I haven't been fair in my judgment of you, I confess it."

Gwendoline leaned forward and took the old woman's hands. She smiled.

"Who is ever fair in her judgment of another?" she said. "I've always felt that you tolerated me on Fife's account. You have always felt that I was nice to you from selfish motives. We understand each other now. And while we both are doing for Fife's wife and daughter we'll learn to know each other right. And perhaps love each other, too."

Mrs. Fife patted Gwendoline's hand.

"I'm an old woman," she said, "But I've learned something new. And I see I've got a lot to live for yet," she declared tremulously.

Cured His RUPTURE

I was badly ruptured while lifting a trunk several years ago. Doctors said my only hope of cure was an operation. Trusses did me no good. Finally I got hold of something that quickly and completely cured me. Years have passed and the rupture has never returned, although I am doing hard work as a carpenter. There was no operation, no lost time, no trouble. I have nothing to sell, but will give full information about how you may find a complete cure without operation, if you write to me. Eugene M. Pullen, Carpenter, 460A Marcellus Avenue, Manasquan, N. J. Better cut out this notice and show it to any others who are ruptured—you may save a life or at least stop the misery of rupture and the worry and danger of an operation.

HOW HE QUIT TOBACCO

This veteran, S. B. Lamphere, was addicted to the excessive use of tobacco for many years. He wanted to quit but needed something to help him.

He learned of a free book that tells about tobacco habit and how to conquer it quickly, easily and safely. In a recent letter he writes: "I have no desire for tobacco any more. I feel like a new man."

Any one desiring a copy of this book on tobacco habit, smoking and chewing, can get it free, postpaid by writing to Edward J. Woods, N 147, Station E, New York City. You will be surprised and pleased. Look for quieter nerves, stronger heart, better digestion, improved eyesight, increased vigor, longer life and other advantages if you quit poisoning yourself.

Gleason's Horse Book

520 Pages Fully Illustrated

All That is Worth Knowing About Training and Treating Horses

Two volumes in one

EVERY person who owns, handles or manages horses and all livestock keepers and breeders should have a copy of this great book because it tells about all the known methods of treating diseases of horses and other domestic animals—methods that are based upon the results of actual practice and not mere theory. It also contains Prof. Gleason's famous system of horse breaking, taming and training therefore, it is in reality two books in one and positively the most authoritative work of the kind ever published. There are in all 520 pages, many of them illustrated and dealing with the cause and cure of practically every disease known to horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, swine and dogs with the right remedies for each disease. Among the many subjects covered in Part 1 of this book are causes of diseases, how to observe diseases, treatment of diseases, Cerebro, Spinal Meningitis, distemper, dysentery, eye diseases, fistula, glands, internal diseases, kidney diseases, poisons, stomach and bowel diseases, worms and literally hundreds of other horse and live-stock ailments, which for lack of space we cannot enumerate here. In Part 2 of this book Prof. Gleason gives to the world for the first time his method of breaking and training horses and there are are also special chapters on how to buy, how to detect unsoundness, feeding, breeding, horse-shoeing, general care of horses, etc. Gleason's Horse Book is actually worth its weight in gold to every horse owner or breeder in the land, yet by special arrangement with the publishers we are enabled to give it away without cost to all who will accept the following

FREE OFFER. For a club of only two 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you Gleason's Complete Veterinary Hand Book and System of Horse Taming exactly as above described free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 443.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

HEAVES.—Every time I feed my horse he has a cough. He has had green pasture all summer. Other than the cough he appears to be in first-class condition.

A.—Do not fed hay. In summer feed grass and in winter let him eat wet oat straw. He may also have roots or silage, along with whole oats and wheat bran. Do not work him soon after a meal or allow him any bulky feed at noon. If the cough persists give him half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning. M. A. B.

SORE EYES.—I have a fine bird dog that has inflammation of the eyes. Pus forms beneath the eyes. MRS. C. E.

A.—Bathe the eyes twice daily with a saturated solution of boric acid applied each time with fresh swabs of absorbent cotton. If the trouble persists apply to the eyelids once daily a little of a five per cent lanolin ointment of yellow oxide of mercury.

GARGET.—I have a fine cow, half Guernsey and half Ayrshire. She was fresh last spring. About once a month she gives clotted milk out of her right front teat. In a few days the other front teat will be the same. Recently when she came up at night the right front quarter of her udder was swelled. MRS. J. F. H.

A.—She may be bruising or chilling her udder. Keep her out of water or filthy places. Milk her three times a day and at night rub the udder with warm melted lard.

WARTS.—I have a fine heifer calf nine months old. Her mouth has been covered with seed warts since she was about six months old. Some very large ones are on her lower lip. MRS. G. W. P.

A.—Rub the affected parts once or twice daily with best Castor oil or fresh goose grease and the warts will soon disappear.

HEAVES.—I have a mule ten years old in good condition that has a dry cough. (2) Can you inform me where I can get Veterinary Text Books? J. S. S.

A.—The disease is incurable, but may be relieved by giving half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning, feeding grass in summer and wet oat straw in winter in preference to hay, allowing no bulky feed at noon and never working the horse soon after a meal. (2) Write to Alex. Eger & Co., Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., for list of veterinary books, or obtain lists through the bookseller of your town.

HEAVES.—I have a horse eight years old. He is thin, but eats heartily. He appears to have the heaves. M. E. B.

A.—See other answer regarding heaves, in this issue of the paper.

WART.—Tell me the trouble with my mule. She has something on her thigh almost as large as a hen's egg. It has been there eight weeks and appears like a cancer or wart. It is raw and bleeds at times. M. B. P.

A.—Either have the wart cut out by a veterinarian who will then cauterize the wound; or ligate it tightly with a fine cord and once daily saturate it with acetic acid. When it drops off cauterize the base with a lunar caustic pencil, or lightly apply some diluted nitric acid, after smearing lard around the part.

LAME HOG.—For a month, my pig which is eight months old and weighs two hundred and fifty pounds, has trembled when on his feet, until he could hardly stand. He appears well, gets lots of milk, prairie grass and a little corn. E. McC.

A.—Overfeeding and lack of exercise cause the trouble and he may go down paralyzed. As he is of good weight and otherwise healthy it would be well to sell him to the butcher or to kill him for meat. The meat will be all right for use.

TROUBLE WITH CREAM.—I would like to know what to do with my cream. The last four or five times when done churning the cream rises thick on the buttermilk and by the amount of butter I don't get all out of the cream. MISS C. E.

A.—The cream is not properly ripened. Perfectly scald all milk utensils including the churn. Add a starter to the cream and warm it slightly until the acidity spreads through the cream. You can get the starter at your creamery. The cream may be either too warm or too cold at churning time so you will have to experiment by adding cold water or heating as required. The cows are in no way to blame.

PARALYSIS.—What is the matter with our dog? He is down in his hips and cannot stand on his hind legs. He eats heartily and he also howls and groans all the time. J. C. W.

A.—We should advise you to put the dog out of his misery, as there is little hope of recovery and practically none if he is eight years old or over. If he is a young dog and has not been injured he may possibly improve if you give him twenty drops of elixir calisaya bark, iron and strychnine twice a day, along with a tablespoonful of emulsion of cod liver oil. Feed him generously.

LAMENESS.—I have a horse nine years old that has sweeny in both his shoulders. He appears to be stiff in his front legs. E. M.

A.—The muscles of the shoulders may be wasted, but the probable cause is chronic disease of the fore feet, such as founder. He may do better if you clip the hair from the hoof heads of both fore feet and blister them repeatedly, one at a time, with a cantharidine blister. Apply the blister at intervals of two or three weeks.

TUMORS.—I have a heifer seventeen months old. About three weeks ago I discovered a knot on her right shoulder about the size of a goose egg. It was soft. On the right side of neck was another knot, rather long and hard. Her left leg is swollen at knee and ankle joint. T. A.

A.—Swab the tumors with tincture of iodine once daily and open if they soften. If the case develops into blackleg the animal will die and the remaining young cattle should be vaccinated at once. Without an examination we are unable to say just what is the matter.

COUGH.—We are renters, bringing two cows and a calf and putting them in a pasture near a small pond where fifty ducks swim in the water. There are twenty head of cattle in this pasture and all have a cough. MRS. M. C.

A.—Such water is quite unfit for cows to drink. They should have well water. If that cannot be managed then the water should be boiled and filtered. The cough may be due to tuberculosis, which is incurable, and the cows certainly should be tested with tuberculin. Any graduate veterinarian can apply the test. If they prove to be free from tuberculosis lung worms may be the cause of cough and the adult cows will recover if well fed; but the calves in addition to good feeding should have medicine injected into the windpipe, by means of a hypodermic syringe and hollow needle used by the veterinarian.

CONTAGIOUS OPHTHALMIA.—I have several calves that have sore eyes. Before they became sore they had a dry cough, which still continues. Their eyes water and a white spot comes on the eyeball. A foamy froth hangs from their mouth. MRS. W. B. L.

A.—Isolate affected calves, as the disease is contagious. Clean up, disinfect and whitewash the stable where they have been kept. Twice daily wash the eyes with a saturated solution of boric acid and every other day dust the eyeballs with a mixture of equal parts of finely powdered calomel and boric acid.

SKIN DISEASE.—I have a five-year-old mare. She breaks out in pimples. The hair falls out and when it grows it is white. (2) She is also infected with worms. W. H. S.

A.—Have the mare clipped, or at least clip the hair from her belly and from the legs above hocks and knees. Keep the chickens out of the stable. Lice from them often cause this trouble, or it may be a form of eczema. Wash affected parts with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip as often as found necessary. (2) If she is not in foal she may have the following medicine for worms: one part each of salt, sulphur and dried sulphate of iron; dose one tablespoonful in the feed night and morning for a week, then skip ten days and repeat. Omit iron if she is pregnant.

INDIGESTION.—I have a calf four months old that seems hearty, but expels its food and stays poor. P. A. P.

A.—Physic the calf with Castor oil shaken up in milk, then feed three times a day on milk to which limewater has been added at the rate of one ounce to the pint. Allow green feed and a mixture of fifty parts of whole oats, thirty parts of wheat bran and ten parts each of corn-meal and flaxseed meal.

VOMITING.—I have a cow, six years old and two thirds Jersey. At night she expels grass or any substance, eaten through the day. She does not appear sick. She has been that way one week, and is weaning her third calf. G. S. L.

A.—Indigestion is the cause. Starve the cow for twenty-four hours, then feed her half as much as she has been getting and see that all of the feed is sound and digestible. If the trouble persists mix a tablespoonful of a mixture of equal parts of bicarbonate of soda and powdered wood charcoal in the feed night and morning.

POISON.—Can you tell me what is the trouble with my pet cats, they eat heartily, and are full grown. This week they all took sick, refused to eat or drink, and vomited green and foamy water; they lived from twelve to eighteen hours, and seemed to always want to be in a cool place. Is it a disease of cats, as everyone dies the same way? MRS. S. R.

A.—It is quite evident that the cats took poison which may have been set for the destruction of rats. The cause must be removed. It is unlikely that the cats could be saved by treatment, but an emetic might be given and followed by a physic.

TUMORS.—I have a cow that has a lump just above the front teat. It is about the size of a hen's egg. Last winter it got so sore we could hardly milk her. It got better, but the lump is still there. It is badly swollen. She gives five quarts at a milking. MRS. E. K.

A.—These tumors may be due to tuberculosis of the udder and if so the milk should not be used. Have her tested with tuberculin. Meanwhile swab the lumps with tincture of iodine every other day.

Poultry Farming for Women

A Subscriber.—Will you please tell me how to feed and what to feed hens to make them moult early for early winter laying, and oblige?

A.—Moulting can be brought about by reducing feed very considerably for two or three weeks, then gradually increasing the rations, which should contain a goodly percentage of animal food, and one tablespoonful of linseed meal to every quart of mixed mash. Next month's COMFORT will contain full instructions how to feed hens to produce winter eggs.

S. H.—I wish to ask through your paper how to raise and care for I. R. ducks, as I have bought thirty-nine head of same and have no experience. Please say what is best to feed them on to get best results. Can you tell me where I can get a book on I. R. Ducks?

A.—Indian Runner ducks should be treated just the same as Pekins. For breakfast give them a mash made as follows: To every two quarts of steamed, cut clover hay, add one quart of wheat bran and one pint of cornmeal or white middlings. Every other day add a small cupful of green cut bone or beef scraps. At noon, give vegetables: cabbage, turnips, beets or anything that you happen to have on hand. If you have a silo, ensilage is a good noon feed. For supper, repeat the morning mash. Grit is of the utmost importance to ducks, and must be kept before them all the time; also plenty of clean drinking water in deep dishes, so that they can get their whole head under water, but not their bodies. If you allow your ducks to run out, there will be no need of anything more than a supper from May to November. The duckhouse must have a board floor, heavily covered with straw or hay, for ducks won't thrive if they have a damp place to sleep in. Furthermore, they are liable to get frozen feet and get lame. Ducks lay during the night or during the very early morning hours. During cold weather the eggs should be gathered as soon as possible to prevent freezing. I know of no book on the care of ducks.

A Lover of COMFORT.—Please tell me through COMFORT if there is any way of telling the sex of young geese before the mating season. If so, how? I wish to keep the geese and sell the gander without waiting until next spring. These are the Toulouse geese.

A.—Experience will teach you that there is a difference in the sound of the cry between the geese and the ganders, but it is impossible to describe it. A gander usually carries his head and neck more erect than the goose. I think you had better try to find a neighbor who can help you. I have referred your inquiry about the cow to the editor of veterinary information. Look in that column for answer.

A Giant Candle

John Pierpont Morgan was always very generous to charities in Italy and so to commemorate his goodness an Italian church in Jersey City has had a giant candle made. It stands sixteen feet high, weighs four hundred pounds and cost $1,500.00. The wick came from Germany, the white wax from Italy. The candle is ornamented with a portrait of Mr. Morgan and American beauty roses painted in oil. It is to stand in the Vatican in Rome and though it would burn nine years before it would burn out, it is to be lighted only one day each year—"All Souls' day," so that it may last thousands of years.

POTATOES AND TOMATOES ON SAME PLANT.—Plants with potatoes on their roots and tomatoes on their tops, raised by H. E. Benson at Britton, S. Dak., may yet place him in the garden wizard class with the famous Burbank. In appearance the plants are of the ordinary potato variety but at their tops are large fruits resembling tomatoes in both meat and seeds. Whether or not these are the ordinary potato balls often seen or a growth caused by the mixing of the pollen of the tomato and potato blossoms is not certain, although the latter explanation is believed to be the true one.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

WELL, well, my dears, what have we here? The last month of another year and we have hardly finished with summer yet, it seems, doesn't it? I suppose you think I should have a whole lot of farewells for the old year, but I won't have one. Not one. All I'm thinking that you are thinking about is that we are to have Christmas soon and that is when everybody is glad and nobody wants to say good by. Let the old year go, if it wants to. There'll be a new one to take its place before anybody misses it and we'll go along just the same as ever. So here's a Merry Christmas to you all and a Happy New Year. Now to work.

The first letter I open is from Anxious of Wacissa, Florida, who has two sweethearts each anxious to marry her and she doesn't know which one to choose. Of course, under such circumstances she shouldn't marry at all, because whichever she marries she may wish she had chosen the other, but as one is younger than she is and the other is a widower with four children, it seems to me that if she marries either she will be sorry for it. It looks to me that she is marrying to be a mother at the start—either to her husband, or to the children of her husband's first wife. Anxious should wait and try somebody else.

Bob's, Central, Ind.—As your engagement is secret, and as you live in different places and as you are not to marry for three years, at least, I think it is quite correct for you to accept attentions from young men in your own town, but you must not flirt with them and must discourage all love-making.

J. C. W., Lover's Lane, Va.—Beware the "jealous natured" sweetheart. The wise girl will not take as a husband any man who becomes "furous" when she talks to anybody else. Jealousy is a kind of madness, and you don't want to marry a maniac, do you?

Curiosity, Leesville, La.—Nobody knows what love is or how it is begotten, or anything definite about it, except that it is and there is no getting away from it, so I shall not try to answer your question. Call it "affinity" if you want to and let it go at that.

Lonesome, Ashland, Pa.—As you are seven years older than he is and he has bad habits you do not like and you don't care a great deal for him, though he says he does for you, my advice is that you treat him as a friend only and go out with him only enough to keep him friendly. He is not to be trusted and you should not be so anxious to marry that you will let him persuade you to marry him. The Lord doesn't answer prayer that way.

Brown Eyes, Siloam Springs, Ark.—Why should you want to leave a good home with kind parents and run away to marry a boy too young to know what marriage responsibility means and too poor to meet it? As you are older than he is, you should teach him better sense. I don't know how much better your people are than his, but his couldn't spell any worse than you do, I am sure.

Brown Eyes, Grand Bay, Ala.—Do as you please, my dear, about marrying him, but I want to tell you now that the kind of man who is always pestering the life out of you wanting to hug and kiss you, isn't the kind who will pester you much that way after he has married you.

Minnehaha, Eureka, Cal.—You write such an otherwise sensible and well-written letter that I am surprised to have you ask if being the same height and complexion as your sweetheart will be likely to cause unhappiness after marriage. That is a foolish superstition you should not be guilty of. I think you are wise to wait until you are twenty-five before marrying, especially as you have such a nice young man to wait for, and you need only tell your parents that if you and he are still satisfied with each other four years hence, you will marry, though you will not become formally engaged until you are ready to announce the approaching marriage. As for kissing him good night, just one tiny one, and that only once a week, I think it would be safe. You know, my dear, I think this will turn out very happily; ideally, in fact. I'm sure it will, if he is as sensible about it as you are.

Puzzled, West Brook, Wis.—For a girl twenty-five years old you must have learned very little of men not to know that social position has very little to do with which way Cupid shoots his arrows. Unless there is a very wide difference in social position, hardly possible in this country, men fall in love with pretty and interesting girls anywhere, and the love is quite as steady as among those of equal social position. Of course, the coarse and ignorant cannot attract the cultured and refined and I am not considering extreme cases. You are too analytic and are too much inclined to believe that you can select beforehand the kind of man who suits you and whom you will suit. You must guess at a whole lot and try out the balance. Don't accept an expensive Christmas present and have something nice and simple to give him if he should give you something, though you may give him something whether he gives you anything or not, or whether you will accept his love or not. Friends may give each other Christmas presents.

Brownie, Ooltewah, Tenn.—Thanks for your very pleasant letter to me about me. Also about yourself and I think you will grow up in your nice home to be a very nice woman. When I say to the cousins to have very little to do with beaus until they are through with school, I mean until they have graduated and are no longer to be under school influences. Yes, when a young man gives you a box of candy you should open it at once and let him enjoy it with you.

Anxious One, Engle, N. M.—Girls should tell their mothers everything and it is a strange kind of a mother who will violate the confidence of a daughter and tell what is told to her. You should tell your mother that you know she has not acted fairly with you and what you think of her for doing so. If she realizes what she has done and is sorry and promises to be what a mother should be, you may trust her again, but be careful.

Girl Friend, Oklahoma City, Okla.—Tell the young man who is not twenty-one not to dream too much about the girl of fifteen who is, or he thinks she is, his angel—or "angle" as you spell it—of light and that he should wait till he and the girl are fully matured and he may think very differently. They nearly always do when they are old enough to know better.

Frankie, Catskill, N. Y.—My dear, I don't know what kind of a young man this unambitious one is you tell me about, but as useless as he might be as a husband, he would be much easier to live with than the New York one who comes to see you only three times a year and, though not engaged, insists upon your not seeing any other young men. Any man as exacting and selfish and suspicious as that is no kind of a man to be a husband to any woman who wants to be happily married.

O. E. L., Alexandria, La.—As your papa objects to your going anywhere, even to church, electric lighted all the way, with the young man, but will let him come to see you, though he must leave before nine o'clock, I think the wisest thing for you to do is to obey your papa and don't try to see the young man except when he calls on you. A half a slice is better than no pie at all.

Cousin Billy, Newbern, N. C.—The best way to attract this young fellow who is not as attentive to you as you want him to be is not to try to attract him at all. When all girls learn this they will have acquired the most attractive quality a girl can have in her association with men.

Brown Eyes, Ishpeming, Mich.—If you expect your mother to live with the man you marry, marry the man she wants you to marry, but if you expect to live with him, marry the man you want to marry.

Glad Heart, Grovertown, Ind.—If you had been a girl of any spirit you would not have permitted the other man to lead you away by the arm when the first man had asked you to go driving with him—unless the first man was not a proper man for you to drive with and the other man knew it. Even then, he should have explained why he did it.

Blonde, Bryan, Texas.—If the young man is the right sort for you to marry and is all right, he may be justified in asking you to go with him, though you disobey your mother by doing so, but if your mother has good reasons for her objections, you should by all means obey her and not see the young man. So many young men are unscrupulous in their attentions to girls.

Sunny Jane, Santa Anna, Texas.—As you have asked the young man for the engagement ring several times and he has promised to give it to you and does not, I think you would be justified in breaking the engagement. I rather think he will break it himself, by and by, if you do not. Something is wrong with him, and now is the time to find out what it is.

Troubled, Linn Creek, Mo.—You are quite right. If he really loved you and wanted you for his wife he would come to see you and being away he would write to you oftener than once a month. If a man is ever devoted to a girl it is when he is engaged to her, and if this one is neglectful now as he is, he will be a hundred times worse if you marry him. Break the engagement and keep it broken.

Puzzled, Scranton, Pa.—I think as your sister does that you are a "funny" girl, and you shouldn't marry anybody until you are old enough to know a great deal more than you now do of the responsibilities of marriage even if it takes a hundred years for you to learn. Just now you are too silly to understand even what it is to be a man's sweetheart.

Blue Bonnet, Bryan, Texas.—A "misunderstanding" which has continued for weeks is likely to become permanent. Why not be sensible and talk it to a finish with the young man? Silly sweethearts make fool husbands and wives. Two young people who start a quarrel and then "don't speak to each other," make me very weary. And of all things, never let a lovers' quarrel extend to the other members of his family. You may snub him for a while and then be as loving as ever, but if you snub his family they take it very differently and you can't get back so easy.

Two Girls, Avon, Ohio.—When a young man meets a girl one evening and the next time he sees her he tells her he loves her with his entire soul and body and wants her to marry him, he is the kind that will bear watching. As he has given her a year to make up her mind, she should tell him to come around at the end of that time and she will let him know. In the meantime she should not see him. If he can stand a test like that, he is probably worth waiting for.

Troubled, Arlington, Ky.—Why do you want me to tell you how to arrange a meeting with this young man who doesn't seem to care enough for you to make his own arrangements? Do you think nice girls chase after young men that way? (2) Second cousins may marry in Kentucky.

Blue Eyes, Marietta, Pa.—Of course, the fireman you have been flirting with from the train stopped off to see what kind of a girl you were, and, my dear, let me say to you that if he saw your letter and knew how badly you spelled and composed and wrote he never would speak to you again until you learned to do better. Suppose you give up flirting for a year or so and take up grammar, spelling and composition.

Blondie, Ironton, Ohio.—Break the engagement as your mother suggests. A young man who will let his marriage be announced three times and postpone it each time is not the kind of a man a girl ought to marry, ever. It is queer to me that you still think he is all right and you don't want to give him up.

Slim, Halliday, N. Dak.—Don't run away with a man at seventeen. Wait until you are twenty-one and by that time maybe you won't even be so anxious to marry him without running away.

Peg, Ishpeing, Mich.—My, my, but you are silly! The young man drinks, you are always quarreling, he plays at a theater and he wants you to run away with him because your parents have too much sense to consent to your marrying him. Yet there are people who wonder why so many marriages are failures. You mind your parents and send the play actor flying.

Blue Eyes, Wilton, Va.—As everything is so lovely and both of you are willing to wait three or four years, I don't see that there is anything to do, but continue the loveliness until you marry and keep it up after that till your dying day. You sure do have my blessing.

There, my dears, all your questions are answered except some that were too silly to be noticed, or were sent to other departments where they belonged and I am sure you are all perfectly satisfied as I am. At least, I am saying so, though maybe I might be mistaken in one or two places. However, here's a Happy Christmas to you and a Happy New Year. By, by.

COUSIN MARION.

Aunt Sophronia's Saint

hat! Why didn't she wear something old and shabby for an outing!

Oh, dear, how horrid everything was! Lawrence's square back, his fair neck—how could anyone care for rowing, it was so slow! The world was a hateful place, anyway, and no one could expect any peace in it, and it would be so nice to be dead!

"Dear me," thought Katherine, "I wonder if I'm seasick?"

It was so unpleasant to feel as she did, and to be sitting there as if she really were an old maid, and those two going on so.

Pretty soon she felt as though she were going to cry, and that would be worse yet.

Dear, dear, why had this hateful Lawrence Lane come to Aunt Sophronia's at all? She had known that his coming would spoil everything, and it had.

Ugh! Those big shoulders of his, and that smooth neck—it was getting pink now—

"No, Mr. Lane, I don't think Miss Sophronia exaggerated in the least. Indeed, I don't think she half did you justice."

It was Hilda, leaning forward and showing her dimples.

"And she didn't do you half justice, either," returned Lawrence, smartly, "when she said you were a perfect treasure."

All at once Katherine felt as she had never felt before in her life, and as she never felt afterward. A quick, mad impulse took possession of her, and, without a moment's thought, she gave a great lurch to the light little craft. One of Lawrence's oars shot up in the air and the other seemed to catch in the water. Another minute, and all three were splashing in the lake, and Hilda was screaming at the top of her voice. The lake, nowhere very deep, was not more than up to the girls' necks at that spot, but Hilda in her fright, lost her wits completely, and made no effort to find a footing.

The boat turned bottom upward and floated near by, bobbing about as their splashings stirred the water.

The oars, also, were floating not far off.

Lawrence, although the whole affair was a complete surprise to him, did not lose his presence of mind for an instant. He groped for a footing at once, and when he found it, stood up and gave himself a huge shake, which sent the water-drops flying right and left.

"Don't be frightened!" he shouted, lustily, "it isn't very deep!"

Then he glanced about him quickly. Katherine was on her feet, her sunbonnet dangling about her neck, preparing to get ashore. Hilda, a little distance off, was grasping and struggling and making every effort, as it appeared, to drown herself.

Lawrence turned to Katherine.

"Go ahead," he said, "you're all right." Then he plunged through the water to Hilda. Seizing her in his arms, he carried her, a limp bundle of dripping, running streams of blue, to the slimy bank.

In spite of her despair, remorse, envy, hatred, malice and a few other emotions, Katherine could not help noticing that there was now no curl in poor Hilda's hair either, and that when it was wet it was not at all pretty, which is the way with light hair.

When they reached the bank, Lawrence helped Katherine with one hand to scale its slippery side, while with the other he held poor Hilda as easily as though she had been a child. When, at length, they had climbed to the top, all three began shaking themselves and gazing wonderingly at one another.

"How on earth did it happen?" asked Hilda.

"It was all my fault," spoke up Katherine.

"It wasn't anybody's fault," said Lawrence, cheerfully.

"You didn't even try to save me," broke out Katherine, impetuously, her lip beginning to curl.

Lawrence looked down at her brightly, and said:

"Do you remember the story of Talleyrand? It's an awful chestnut: Seated one day between Madame Recamier and Madame de Stael, the latter asked him if she and Madame Recamier were to fall into the water, which one he would save.

"Madame," returned the diplomat, "you know everything, you know how to swim. I would save Madame Recamier."

* * * * * * * * * * *

That evening about teatime, Lawrence Lane was seated in Aunt Sophronia's big, square hall, reading, when the patter of dainty footsteps on the oak staircase made him look up.

An apparition was descending.

The most graceful, slim-waisted little figure, in a cool, white frock, was before his eyes. The late April sunshine streaming through the window on the stairs outlined the charming figure, making it almost divine, and throwing into radiance the beautifully arranged rippling copper hair. The cool, white frock had half short sleeves, and one pretty white hand and arm lay along the banister rail, while the other gathered back the soft trailing skirts.

There were satin rosettes on the apparition's shoulders, and her bare throat, as seen against the sunlight, was charmingly curved and white.

Lawrence got to his feet at once and uttered a short exclamation.

As the white figure neared him he gazed at it piercingly.

"Miss—Miss—Miss Kinney?" he inquired, hesitatingly.

"Yes, Mr. Lane, it is I, clothed in my right mind." And she came down to the last step and stood facing him.

The saint began to show his white teeth.

"I have two confessions to make, Mr. Lane," began Katherine, holding her head on one side and looking down at her little white shoe.

The saint began regarding her earnestly, and this time he did so without a shudder.

"Yes," continued Katherine, "two confessions. In the first place, I'm not homely at all——"

"No!" interrupted the saint. "Aren't you, though, really?"

"No!" promptly. "And it was only because I hated you so and didn't want you to fall in love with me that I dressed myself up in those horrible things of Aunt Sophronia's. I'm not an old maid either."

The young man looked her over from head to toe.

"No," he concluded, "I don't believe you are." "And what's more," went on Katherine, feeling that she could not be generous enough after the wicked things she had thought and done, "I want to beg your pardon for calling you a cad and a hypocrite."

"Did you call me a cad and a hypocrite?"

"Well, not to anyone but myself. But you see it was just this way: Aunt Sophronia talked so much about your being a saint and all that, that I made up my mind before I saw that you were a cad, and as soon as I saw you that you were a hypocrite, because you see, saints are little, weazened, effeminate, wishy-washy creatures."

Lawrence laughed.

"Then you don't think me a cad and a hypocrite any more?" he asked.

"No, I don't. And now that I see you're not a saint, and don't even want to be, I'm sorry I kept you from falling in love with me."

Katherine blushed up to the waves in her hair, but the words were out, and it was too late to recall them.

"Perhaps it isn't too late yet," suggested the unsainted saint.

Katherine shook her head.

"I'm afraid it is," she returned, "for I intended to tell you the whole truth. I upset the boat today."

"You!" exclaimed Lawrence, starting. "I don't believe it. It was an accident."

"It wasn't an accident. I did it purposely."

"But why?" And he clasped his hands around the banister-post and gazed at her.

"Because you seemed to find Hilda so pretty."

"She isn't half so pretty as you!" he blurted out.

"Oh! don't you think so, honestly?" And Katherine forgot her confessions, and clasped her hands around the rail farther up.

"No, not half; and she's a little coward, too."

"Oh, dear!" cried the sinner, her penitence scattering to the four winds, "I'm so glad I upset it!"

"I say," began the young man, presently, "do you always look like this? for, if so, I'm sure I'll fall in love with you."

"Oh, yes!" answered Katherine, eagerly, "always." Then she recovered herself: "That is, as long as I curl my hair," she added, honestly.

At this moment Aunt Sophronia came out of the library.

"What!" she cried, delightedly, upon seeing them there, "making love at last?"

"Oh, botheration, Cousin Soph!" returned her saint, with a frown. "Get a move on you, please! We're just going to!"

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

Believe Me I Eat Everything

For I Know a Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet Will Digest Any Meal At Any Time.

The Pessimist—"Your appetite disgusts me. You eat like a giant sloth."

The Optimist—"Believe me, I give my body what it tells me to give it, and whether it be midnight or noon I always obey appetite and then I eat a Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet."

How often do we see men who cannot eat and how often do we hear other men boasting of their abilities to eat.

The secret of all health is digestion. The secret of digestion is the juices which are supplied by the body to separate the ingredients needed from those that are of no use to the system.

When a heavy meal has been eaten the entire body is called upon to furnish the digestive organs with forces to take care of it. The more the strain the weaker become the forces to take care of the next meal as well.

A Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet aids Nature in Nature's own way. These little tablets are filled with the very ingredients and essences so needful to every normal and perfect stomach.

One quality or ingredient of a Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet will digest 3,000 times its weight in food. Think if you can what a big help this means to a depleted digestion. Other ingredients aid in building up the digestive juices and blood. The stomach and intestines have their duties lightened and thus irritation, soreness and raw linings are permitted to be cured by the system naturally, quickly, harmlessly.

Thousands of dyspeptics and stomach sufferers would be glad to tell you what Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have done for them. This is what makes these tablets sold in every drug store in this country, price 50 cents.

To anyone wishing a free trial of these tablets please address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich., and a small sample package will be mailed free.

Manners and Looks

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Bather, Lawrenceburg, Ind.—A Balkan blouse and circular bloomers are very good for a bathing suit, though rather more copious than the usual attire. Still, the Ohio river is more modest, we imagine, than the briny deep. Any color will do so long as it is visible a long way off. (2) We haven't space to tell you what games to play at your party, and how to play them, and we wouldn't tell you if we had because we believe in people making their own parties to suit themselves, instead of borrowing ideas from other people. Make it to suit yourself and you will have the satisfaction of knowing it was your own party, anyway. But don't have any kissing games. They went out of style forty years ago.

Peggy, Houston, Texas.—It isn't good etiquette, maybe, but it is pretty fair dealing if the bachelor of thirty-five who wants to marry you says he will kill you both if you marry the boy of seventeen and you a widow of twenty-seven. You needn't marry the bachelor unless you want to, but, for the love of Mike, don't marry the boy.

Mrs. E., Grant, Okla.—A wife cannot be too particular about accepting attentions from other men than her husband, however good her motives may be. We do not see any harm in your driving to church with the young man living in your house when your husband cannot go with you and you take your little boy along, but we are very sure if you did it very often some of your own Christian sisters in the church would be the very first to start some disagreeable gossip or other about it. We do not know why they should, but experience in all communities of human beings shows it to be a fact. You might go with him occasionally, or with some other friend of your husband, but have a care and do not let yourself be seen too often in the company of other men when your husband isn't with you. Both men and women will gossip if you do, no matter how good you are and how willing your husband is to trust you. Such gossips should be killed off, but there is no legal way of doing it and good people must suffer by them until they can be got rid of some way.

Mrs. B. C., Carter, Okla.—Naming the baby has been a problem ever since babies began coming into the world and lots of them have suffered by the names given to them without their consent. Why not let the baby grow up without a name until it is old enough to have a voice in the choice? If not that, give it a family name, like Bruce, or Scott, or Woodrow, or Lloyd, or Courntney, or the name of your town or county, or some pretty Indian name? These will fit either boy or girl and if you choose names of your own family they will be valuable as a means of identification. Don't give it any of the usual first names given to babies, or any Bible names for they have been worn out long ago. We might suggest the double name Okla Homa, for either boy or girl, and you would have a name for the baby to be proud of. Let us know what you do name it. If it is a girl, why not call it Comfort? That's a fine name for a girl and used to be very popular in Puritan circles.

Cinderella, Waco, Texas.—If you think you would rather marry a widower with six children than to lose him and his three sections of "good, black land," go ahead and marry him, but we think you will be paying a high price for land.

Peggie, Pettigrew, Ark.—Compromise with your older sister who insists upon reading all your letters by insisting that you read one of hers every time she reads one of yours. If she will not agree to that, don't let her read any of yours. We think though, if you are young and are receiving letters from young men, you would be wiser and safer to let her see them and advise you. Young girls get very silly in their letters sometimes, and the letters they receive are sillier and sometimes dangerous. (2) You can learn to make hair switches only from a teacher, either in a hair store or elsewhere.

Black-eyed Lass, Hosford, Fla.—Some time when you are talking to the bashful young man ask him to call on you. This is quite the proper thing to do and when he calls you can find out how much in earnest he is. As you have never been to school we advise that you take up spelling, reading and writing at home of evenings. You need it very much indeed, and you can learn a great deal by your own effort if you will make the effort.

Two Boys, Sainco, Texas.—Go right on, both of you, courting the same girl. Young fellows of your age and experience need a good, sharp girl to teach you some hard sense. She's having fun with you now, because she knows that she will never again meet two quite as mushy as you two are.

Inquirer, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—The host or hostess "breaks up company" at dinner, and never a guest. The guest at table has no more right to make the first move to leave than he would have to make the first move to go into dinner. (2) It is largely a matter of choice whether the man walks between two ladies or at their side, either right or left, as may be, but in formal usage, he oftener walks at their side and to their right, and on the outside of the sidewalk rather than the inside, unless there is a good reason for taking the inside. These observances are not so strict among friends who are less formal.

Ignorance, Bryan, Texas.—If the young people of your community go autoing or horseback riding without chaperons it is proper for you to do so. In some communities, usually cities or large towns, it is not. (2) We think any young lady should have the nerve to turn down any young man who had the nerve to ask her to let him go home with her from a show to which he had let her go alone and pay her own way. The girl that won't do it deserved just such company.

F. D., Roy, N. M.—The lady may ask the gentleman escorting her home from church for the first time to call on her. She merely says she would be glad to have him call. When the gentleman asks the lady to dance with him she accepts, by a bow and smile and starting into the dance. Etiquette-book rules are not to be followed strictly on such occasions. People should have a chance to be natural sometimes. The lady may use any kind of stationery she wants to pay for. Heavy, plain white is always in good taste.

R. R., Webberville, Mich.—Unmarried pastors always cause more or less trouble among the sisters of their congregations and you are having your share after he has been flirting with you for six or seven months. As he has now grown tired of you and says he will leave you, we don't see that you can do anything else but stop loving him as your supposed sweetheart and love him merely as your pastor. Next time an unmarried pastor comes your way flirting, give him the icy stare at the very beginning. It's the only safe way to treat pastors of that kind. COMFORT church members, please make a note of this.

Devoted, Pittsburg, Pa.—First cousins cannot legally marry in Pennsylvania, neither can they in your nearest state, Ohio, but they can in New York and you could go there and be married if both of you are willing to take all the risk of blood-marriage. We do not approve of it, but as long as the law allows it in some states, our disapproval counts for nothing. A happy marriage, even at a risk, we suppose is better than an unhappy marriage without risk, or no marriage at all. So we give you our blessing, though we do so under some protest.

Anxious, Athens, Texas.—An occasional hug from your father-in-law, if his son does not object, we suppose is harmless enough, but don't permit the old gentleman too much liberty that way, even though it is more pleasant to have him hug you than to have him hit you, as is the custom of some fathers-in-law.

Things the Modern Farmer Must Know

the shells and examining the contents we found a number of small pearls about the size of a grain of mustard seed, some of which were very bright and pretty; also one creamy white, round and very lustrous, measuring about three sixteenths of an inch in diameter. I took the pearls to Birmingham, N. Y., and showed them to two different jewelers. One said he did not think them of much value. The other said he knew nothing about pearls, but thought the large pearl might be valuable; the smaller ones he thought were worth hardly anything. It seems to me there must be a sale somewhere for even the smaller ones, as I have seen many very small pearls set in jewelry. I have about 300 hens which devoured the clam meats readily. I think I could utilize the meats and shells at a small profit on the farm, if I could find a market for the pearls. Kindly inform me if you know the name and address of any dealer who buys them.

MRS. F. A. B., Lawsville Center, Pa.

A.—There is a market for American fresh-water pearls obtained from the fresh-water "clam," as you call it; and it is commonly known by that name, although the scientists classify it as a mussel, designating it as the fresh-water mussel to distinguish it from the marine species. Fresh-water pearls are in less favor than those from the sea, and the market prices of the former range lower than those of the latter; pearls of either class must be up to a certain standard in order to be salable at all, and then the prices vary largely according to size and quality. Very small pearls are of little if any value. We are informed that J. R. Wood & Sons, 170 Broadway, New York City, and Tiffany & Co., N. Y., deal in fresh-water pearls to some extent, but Eugene A. Kohut, doing business under the name of the American Pearl Headquarters at 65 Nassau St., New York City, makes a specialty of handling American fresh-water pearls and probably pays as liberal prices as any dealer. Write these concerns for further information. Kohut issues a circular on the subject. You speak of using the shells "on the farm." I presume you crush and feed them to your hens. Perhaps you might realize more profit by selling the shells to button manufacturers who pay from eighteen dollars a ton, up. Write the Beopple Button Works, Fairport, Iowa, for information as to prices paid for shells. Quite likely fresh-water pearl fishing might be carried on profitably as a side line by farmers favorably situated near rivers or lakes. It is pursued as a business on some parts of the Mississippi river, more especially for the shells used in button making. See our article on Fresh-water Pearls on another page of this issue.

A VENTURE IN CURRANT RAISING.—I am thinking of buying 4,000 two-year-old currant bushes, at a cost of $600.00, from a nursery concern which guarantees a yield of three to four quarts to the bush in 1916 and 1917 and offers me a written contract to take the entire crop at ten cents a quart for the next five years. What is the average yield of currants? Do they ever fail? Would you advise me to undertake such a venture? I know nothing about currants and desire all the information I can get before taking such a step. W. T., Scottburg, Ind.

A.—It would in our opinion be foolish in the extreme to enter into a contract of any sort without being well informed and experienced in fruit raising. The bushes may well produce the amount of fruit mentioned if properly handled, but they may die, or may not bear fruit or the "bugs" may prevent fruiting. Take our advice and buy a dozen bushes and plant and care for them according to directions and instructions you can get in a bulletin to be had for the asking from your state experiment station. Also ask an opinion as to the proposed investment. Let every reader of this paper who is contemplating a step such as this correspondent mentions ask for advice from the state experiment station before investing money.

BLACKLEG IN CATTLE.—Can it be cured or prevented? E. S., Wis.

A.—Yes. A preventive serum is used for this purpose. The animals are injected with this serum which produces immunity from the disease. It should be applied by a competent veterinarian. It can be obtained from many of our agricultural colleges and also from the United States Department of Agriculture. Consult our veterinary adviser for further information.

SEED CORN GOT WET.—We saved a good lot of seed corn and had it dried in good shape but the roof leaked and it got wet before we knew about it. Will this spoil it for seed? J. R., Ind.

A.—No, if you dry it out again at once. If not, mold will start to grow and mold soon destroys the germ in seed corn. By all means test this corn before planting. It may be already spoiled if it was wet too long.

PACKING APPLES.—Will apples keep any longer if wrapped in paper and packed in a box than they will if put away in the barrel? O. H., Mich.

A.—Yes, they should. Wrapping protects each apple from every other apple. It is an old saying that "one rotten apple spoils the barrel." This is literally true because one apple catches the rot disease from its nearest neighbor. This is prevented in a large measure by wrapping each apple separately.

SKIMMED-MILK FILMS.—The menace of a "film famine" which, because of the European war threatened to hurt the American moving picture industry, has been banished. Moving-picture film is being made out of skimmed-milk. The first roll of practical skimmed-milk film was shown in the exhibit of the Illinois State Food Commissioner at the national dairy show in Chicago.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

J. H., Rainier, Oregon.—Noises in the head, or ear with partial deafness, are very common and are due usually to catarrhal conditions, either of the stomach, affecting the alimentary canal and its various mucous membrane connections, or to nasal catarrh which affects the air passages leading into the ear. About the only remedy for nasal catarrh is change of climate, while the other may be relieved by proper diet and good digestion. Consult a physician and have him tell you what you need.

Mrs. M. E., Canton, Texas.—Measles not infrequently leaves very serious results and while your trouble in the back and nerves may be from that, there is a fair chance that it is not. The only way to settle the matter is to have two or three physicians examine you and determine. As we have often said to COMFORT readers, we repeat, that when in ignorance of what ails them, they should not try to cure themselves in their ignorance, but should get a physician's opinion and receive competent treatment, based on facts and not guesswork.

J. H. T., Charlotte, N. C.—Birthmarks may be removed, or at least very much improved in appearance, but only by experts. They are not to be removed by any home remedies, or ignorant and unskilled persons. Consult a physician. Birthmarks are often very disfiguring and when they may be removed or improved, we believe every individual owes it to himself or herself to have it done.

Lazy Mother, Watertown, Mass.—You are anything but lazy and if you could sleep as much as you want to, we think it would be good for your over-wrought nerves. Since you have come to town to live and you have less heavy work to do and feel the need of activity, perhaps, if you could get some kind of work outside of your home, whatever you could do best, it might be a relief to you and add a few dollars to your income. At the same time you need not neglect your family, which is now pretty well able to look after itself. As your doctor told you, you need enough to do to keep your mind off yourself.

Miss A., Prairie du Chien, Wis.—St. Vitus's Dance, or chorea, being due to various causes and pathological conditions requires different remedies and treatment the purpose of all being to improve the nutrition of the body generally and of the nervous system by good food, rest and warmth. This being the case the sufferer with chorea must have the attention of a physician. The disease should not be allowed to continue longer than a month or two, for the longer it continues the more difficult it is to cure. Usually it may be cured and we advise you to continue your efforts at overcoming it, especially as you should have fifty years of life yet to live. The Mayo physicians are of the very first order. Get their opinion if you can.

H. J., Honolulu, S. I.—We hardly think dentistry could be taught by mail. At least, if it could be, we would not like to have such a dentist get into our mouth.

L. M. N., New York, N. Y.—Bicarbonate of soda, like anything else, is injurious if taken to excess, but in proper quantity is a very useful and generally adopted antacid used in nearly all remedies for indigestion. If you are troubled with acid stomach a pinch of soda in half a glass of water will correct it. A better remedy, however, is a glass of water as hot as it can be drunk. This is a real aid to digestion. You may drink all the hot water you have space for and be benefited by it. We cannot publish a good remedy for indigestion because every stomach has its own and what is good for one may not be for another. You must use your own judgment in what you eat and when and how, remembering that the one rule applying to all is to chew thoroughly every mouthful of food before it is swallowed.

E. W., Saswaka, Okla.—What you call nervousness may be one kind of nervous affection, but it is not a disease to be cured by medicine. It is a common trouble with a great many people and is due to self consciousness, that is, the people having it keep their thoughts on themselves instead of thinking about other things. You can cure yourself by not imagining that you are the central figure of any company, or that everybody is thinking about how you look or what you are saying, or who you are. Just think you are not worth thinking about by other people and keep your thoughts on them and what interests them and you will not be troubled by the hot flushes and nervousness and fear that you may make a mistake or do something else embarrassing.

E. F., Woodlawn, Ala.—The itching under the toes is due probably to some eczematous condition. The dryness is part of it and if you will apply night and morning, after bathing and thoroughly drying the feet cocoa-butter we think you will find relief. You can get this at the drug-store in half pound cakes at thirty or forty cents. Cocoa-butter is an excellent skin food and may be used in any kind of skin irritation. It is a good thing to have handy in the house. It is believed by some that an excess of uric acid in the blood will manifest itself by itching under the toes with cracking of the skin. Apply the cocoa-butter and take lithia tablets. Directions on the bottle.

I. A., Lenox, Iowa.—Bad breath may be due to diseased condition of the mouth or teeth, or from bad digestion, or other stomach troubles, or from catarrh of the throat or nose. Taking the ordinary breath sweeteners, so called, into the mouth are merely temporary and are of no permanent value. You must determine the cause by a physician's examination and then remove, or remedy, the cause, by medicine or the dentist's chair.

I. O. F., Jackson, Miss.—No more than does your own doctor do we think you have Bright's Disease, but as you insist that doctors will not tell you the truth, why should we say anything? If you will see a doctor and have him make a thorough examination and prescribe properly for you you will probably be well enough before long to believe nearly anything a doctor will tell you. Indigestion is more likely to be your ailment than anything else and from that comes your nervousness and other troubles. (2) The clinical definition of anæmia is a condition of system in which improvement of the blood, whether from want or waste, is associated with symptoms of imperfect discharge of the vital functions. The causes are many and complex and the treatment is usually long with favorable results in the majority of cases.

K. I., Kiron, Iowa.—Trouble from the prostate gland and the urinary organs is very common among elderly men and as a rule very little can be done do remedy it. It seems to be a weakness of age and while the physician can do something to help in acute and severe cases very little permanent good may be gained. Sometimes an operation will be of benefit, but this is not to be resorted to except on the recommendation of more than one physician.

Subscriber, Scranton, Pa.—You will improve the circulation in your legs and make the veins less prominent if you will massage them two or three times a day, rubbing upward with the hands. This will also reduce the liability of cramps. Massaging may be done at any time and as often as you please. The goiter is quite another thing—if it is a goiter—and you must consult a doctor about that. Also let him look at the veins and see if there is anything serious the matter.

Reader, Toulon, Ill.—A man five feet eight inches tall should weigh at thirty-six one hundred and fifty-seven pounds and your weight is therefore thirty-seven pounds too light. Your sugar, eggs and milk diet will add flesh. Potatoes, fat meat, bread and plenty of water will also build up flesh. Take as little exercise as possible and sleep all you can. Cut out the whiskey drinking and drink beer instead. Also remember that some people are born to be thin and they cannot get fat. As long as your health is good and you have strength and your temper is serene you shouldn't bother about being thin. Fat is no sign of health.

Mrs. B., Daleview, Mont.—Iodine is a poison if improperly administered, and if you intend to use it you should get it from a physician or druggist whom you should tell what you want to use it for.

O. S., Shellsburg, Iowa.—Diet has very much to do with giving you a pimply complexion. Stop eating sweets and fats and drinking tea and coffee. Eat very little greasy food, drink milk and hot water, take no pastry, and once or twice a week take a dose of salts before breakfast, at least for a short time. Keep your face thoroughly clean, using hot water and pure soap, rinsing afterwards with cold water and rubbing the face dry, but not hard enough to roughen the skin.

M. K. R., Everton, Mo.—Don't ask us about curing varicocle by "subcutaneous ligature of the diseased veins," but go see a doctor. Varicocele is not a disease for self-cure even if you can use large language about it.

C. C., New York, N. Y.—A sixteen-year-old boy shouldn't have anything the matter with him and you would not if you knew something about your physical make-up. The headaches and swelling of the face may come from bad digestion. Anyway, you live in the midst of many doctors and free hospitals and you should go right away and find out about yourself and what you should do to keep in good condition. Don't be like too many COMFORT readers and make yourself worse by trying to be your own doctor.

Mrs. F., Calumet, Okla.—A fourteen-year-old boy who walks five miles a day to and from school should have more to eat than a dish of oatmeal for breakfast and some bread and molasses for dinner. No wonder he is small for his age if he has been living that way very long. He likes meat, you say, and he should have it, even if you do live nine miles from a butcher shop. If you want your boy to be a full grown, healthy man, and not an unhealthy little runt, feed him well and plenty while he is growing. And don't put it off any longer, either. Other COMFORT parents with growing boys and girls take notice and act. Feed your children carefully, but give them plenty of good digestible food.

M., Swan Lake, Ky.—The physician was right who advised you to use glasses. The fact that you do not want to wear them makes you like a good many other COMFORT readers who seem to prefer to run the risk of ruining their sight rather than to wear glasses. Of course, we can't guess what is the matter with them, nor can any physician who cannot make a personal examination, but take the advice of that one who did see them and told you to wear glasses. By and by when some other physician can see them and cure them so you need not wear glasses you may take them off.

Mrs. T. B., New York, N. Y.—We know of no depilatory which removes hair permanently without more or less injury to the skin. There are treatments, however, by electric needle which are said to be permanent. In your city are many of these specialists and we advise that you consult one of them, but get a good one.

A Thorn Among Roses

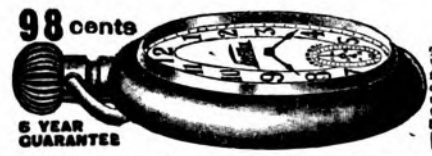
her hair. "I am no longer nameless, poor and without kith or kin in the world. I have a proud name, an honored position, great wealth and a beautiful home." His voice was tremulous with exultation as he said it, for he was almost wild with joy that he had all this to lay at her feet—to bestow upon her whom his heart idolized.

"Very—very glad," she murmured, but with a slight catch in her breath, for her heart seemed breaking.

"That sounds very, very doubtful," he retorted, laughing; but she could endure no more.

She arose and stood white and cold before him.



"Will!" she gasped.

He also sprang to his feet, frightened by her manner and tone.

"Alice!" he breathed tenderly, and would have drawn her into his arms.

But she put out her hand and gently repulsed him.

"This means that you and I must—part," she whispered, hoarsely, and the agony in her face smote him like a knife.

He looked like one stunned for a moment.

The next she was in his arms and resting on his breast, clasped close—so close that she could not move and could feel every throb of the loving heart that beat only for her.

"Part!—you and I?—never! It means no such terrible thing," he cried, and his voice thrilled her with new life; "it means that in just one year from this time you will be my dear and honored wife and—Lady Marchmont, the future Marquise of Leith."

RAISE HOGS, YOUNG MAN.—Wealth will come more quickly to the young farmer who embarks in the business of raising hogs than any other branch of farming he may choose. E. T. Cash of St. Louis made this assertion before 700 members of the American Meat Packers' Association attending the ninth annual convention held at Chicago. There is more money in raising hogs than in any other branch of farming, Mr. Cash said, because they can be fed more cheaply and the demand in the markets of the world is daily increasing.

Austrian Bead Necklace

The Latest Imported Novelty In Necklaces For 1914

This Is "THE" Style This Season. Don't Fail To Send For One.

Hand Made From Strings Of Beautiful White Austrian Beads Woven Together And Finished With Handsome Imit. Amethyst And Gold Bead Decorated Pendant.

Bead necklaces are more fashionable than ever this season. For the last two or three years these handsome, inexpensive neck ornaments have been steadily growing in popular favor and now the style has become so firmly established that no lady or girl can really call herself "up-to-date" in dress unless she is wearing one of them. The most beautiful necklaces come from Austria where they are hand made by skilled workmen who first string the beads in single strand then cleverly weave the strands together in different ways producing many varied handsome effects. The style shown here was the prettiest one we found among a dozen different samples submitted for our approval so we have purchased a large quantity of them and are going to distribute them free among our readers. It consists of three strands of pure white Austrian beads woven together so as to form a single strand which fastens with gold-plated clasp and in the center there is attached as a pendant a smaller double strand of beads decorated with a beautiful large imit. Amethyst, an imit. gold bead and a large pear-shaped bead at the extreme end. This necklace when unclasped is 15 inches in length while the lower part, or pendant, is 2½ inches in length. The real beauty of this handsome new necklace does not appear in our illustration but we hereby guarantee that every lady or girl who receives one from us on this offer will be more than delighted with it. Be sure to read the following free offer then send in your order today.

For One Subscription!

Send us only one new 15-months subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents or your own subscription, renewal or extension of present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) and we will mail you free and postpaid this beautiful and stylish Austrian Bead Necklace exactly as above illustrated and described. Premium No. 679.

W. H. COPELAND, (photo above) reports: "My hair is improving right along, the former bald spot looks darker; I am thankful I heard of Koskott."

Read These Excerpts from Letters; We Have Legions More.

"I have used Koskott about 6 weeks and hair has started out all over my head. If all the people who need a hair remedy could believe what I know about Koskott, you would need a laboratory ten times as large to supply demand." Henry E. Powers, Penobscot Co., Maine.

"For eight or nine years I have been a bald-headed man; the top of my head was as bare as my hand. Now hair is growing again, it is the most wonderful thing I ever saw." Lee Fish, Clayton Co., Iowa.

"I can no longer find the place where the bald spot was: the hair is as long there as on any other place of the head." Matt Bagley, Itasca Co., Minn.

"My hair has quit falling out, my scalp itches no more and new hair is growing thickly." Mrs. J. Lundeen, Multnomah Co., Oregon.

"After being bald 20 years, my head is mostly covered with new hair; am well pleased with Koskott." Geo. Van Wyck, Union Co., N. J.

"The baldness on my head has entirely disappeared, being covered with hair, by use of Koskott." Prof. C. E. Bowman, Maryland.

"For growing hair and making it beautiful, there is nothing like Koskott, for my hair is now a surprise to all my friends. I am telling everybody of your wonderful hair grower. Mrs. W. Rabiger, Alleghany Co., Pa.

"Koskott has started a new growth of hair on my head." R. C. Cunningham, Abbeville Co., S. C.

"The hair is now about an inch long on my head where there was not a hair in 30 years; Koskott did it." J. J. Ellis, Minnesota.

"Four months ago my scalp was bare; now it is covered with a nice growth of hair growing nicely." W. C. Colman, Red River Co., La.

"One sample box and one full box of Koskott have grown hair on my head where I was perfectly bald." A. W. Bowser, Butler Co., Pa.

"I was bald and never could find anything to bring the hair back until I used Koskott." Esther Arnett, Wallace Co., Ky.

MRS. JENNIE DAVIS, who reports full growth on completely bald head. She used Koskott exclusively.

We offer to send you a testing box Koskott FREE, postpaid. It is probably different from anything you ever used on your scalp before. The formula is prescribed by many physicians for various forms of scalp and hair trouble.

It is inexpensive because concentrated. No impossible claims are made and you cannot know what Koskott will do in your case until you use it; but we know that it has surprised and delighted many who were losing or had lost their hair and feared they must remain bald throughout life.

What Koskott has done for others, why not you?

If you have entire or partial baldness, alopecia areata (bald spots), barber's itch, dandruff, dry scalp, brittle hair, falling hair, if you get a lot of hair on your comb, itching scalp, etc., try Koskott.

255 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three November wheel chairs go to the following named persons. The figures after the names indicate the number of subscriptions which the friends of the respective recipients have sent in aid of the Wheel-Chair Club.

Miss Bama Leslie, Marshall, Ark., 191; Miss N. M. Hogg, Midland, Texas, 125; George Shaw, Edenville, Mich., 125.

I presume that you who help earn the wheel chairs like to be told something about those who receive them. Miss Leslie is 45 years of age, has fairly good health and is strong in her arms, but has no use of her lower limbs which have been crippled from birth and are drawn badly out of shape. Of course she is sadly in need of the wheel chair and she expects to derive great benefit from possessing it, chiefly because it will enable her to get out and enjoy the open air and sunshine. Can you imagine what it is to be a shut-in crippled from birth?

Miss Hogg is 61 years of age. For 14 years she has suffered severely from rheumatism which has so crippled her hips and knees that she has not walked in eight years; she has only partial use of her hands. She hopes that her wheel chair will bring some relief of her sufferings.

Regarding George Shaw's condition his good mother writes: "George was thrown from a horse when eight years old. The fall injured his back and brought on a spinal trouble which grew worse so that since he was 15 he has been unable to walk. He is now 31 years old and entirely helpless from his body down. His arms are getting stiff so that he can not comb his hair or help himself at all. Yet he never complains, but bears it all patiently and cheerfully."

There are many other equally distressing cases among the wheel-chair applicants on our waiting list.

Don't you feel impelled this December, the Christmas month, to do something to help COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Club in its good work? Will you not send in at least one subscription this month to help provide a wheel chair for another poor shut-in.

The monthly Roll of Honor and some touching letters of thanks from recent recipients of COMFORT wheel chairs follow.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Enables Her to Get Out in the Fresh Air After Eleven Years of Confinement

GUIN, ALA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Words are inadequate to express my gratitude to you and my dear friends who made it possible for me, after eleven years of confinement, to be out in a COMFORT wheel chair and breathe God's fresh air again. None will ever know, unless afflicted in like manner, just how much those small gifts of 20-cent wheel-chair subscriptions merge into great blessings of comfort and happiness. May God reward each one and all with good health and true happiness.

Your grateful friend,

MRS. ERVIN SMITH.

More Than Pleased with Her Fine COMFORT Wheel Chair

BIEBER, CAL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I received my wheel chair this morning, and wish to thank you, and all kind friends who so kindly helped me get it. It is a fine chair, and I am more than pleased with it. Very gratefully yours.

MRS. M. MITCHELL.

Real Comfort for Him to Move Himself in COMFORT Wheel Chair

BIG ROCK, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

The wheel chair for my father, Pink Robertson, came all right. He and I are much pleased with it. He can wheel himself some in it which is a real comfort to him. I want to thank you and Mr. Gannett and all kind friends who helped to get it for father.

Yours truly, BETTIE WALKER.

Delighted with His COMFORT Wheel Chair

SALMON, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I want to thank you, Mr. Gannett and all friends who so kindly helped me get my chair. I am delighted with it. It is satisfactory in every way. May God bless you all.

Gratefully yours, J. K. LAMANCE.

Can't Imagine How Much Pleasure She Gets from Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

PLATTSBURG, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I received my wheel chair safely, and oh, how thankful I am that I can get out in the fresh air and sunshine after thirteen weary years of confinement. You can't imagine how much pleasure I get from my wheel chair. Thank you and Mr. Gannett and all kind friends who helped me to get the chair. Your afflicted friend,

MINNIE YARBROUGH.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

quiring an education. The cure for the ills of democracy lies not in confining and restraining democracy, but in a more abundant and lavish democracy. This country belongs to the people and the people are entitled to anything and everything that is in it, and woe be to any class of men who try to restrict those rights, especially at the ballot box.

GRANDFIELD, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a little girl fifteen years old. I have gray eyes and dark brown hair and fair complexion. I go to school and am in the sixth grade. There are about seventeen pupils going to school out here. Uncle Charlie, do you like to fish? I do. We go fishing on the creek every summer, and we catch plenty of nice fish, too. My mother takes the COMFORT and we all enjoy reading it, especially the letters. I can cook and wash dishes and sew. How many of the cousins like to read? I do. My father is a farmer. He raises cotton corn, and sweet potatoes also velvet beans. We have plenty of fruit. I would like to hear from some of the cousins. This is my first letter and I hope Billy the Goat will not devour it.

With best wishes to Uncle Charlie and the cousins.

Your niece, NELLIE CLARK.

Yes, Nellie, I am very fond of fishing, fishing for new ideas, new hopes, new ideals. I never, however, was much of a success as a fisherman. Whenever the fish see me coming, they always fly up into the trees on the banks of the lake, river or creek, wherever it may happen to be, and remain there until I go home. Once however I was very successful at catching fish, broke all the records (I don't mean phonograph records, but fish records). I caught twelve fish all at once. How did I do it? Well a man threw a can of sardines at my head and I caught them on the fly. That's what you may call fly fishing. Ha! Ha! Ha! Another way to catch fish is to lie on the bottom of a river with a hook in your hand and make a noise like a worm. Another excellent way is to make a hole in the middle of a stream, put a grasshopper on the edge, lie down by the side of the hole and every time a fish jumps up to catch the grasshopper, grab him by the hind leg. I'm very fond of fish, Nellie, but though I live within a mile or two of the ocean where scores of tons of fish are caught daily, I'm afraid to eat it. The fish trust puts the fish in cold storage, and you have an excellent chance of getting ptomaine poisoning every time you eat it. Everything that would feed the multitude, reduce the cost of living and fill the stomachs of the hungry and poor, is in the hands of commercial pirates who charge twenty-five cents a pound for fish that does not cost a quarter of that price. If I were Mayor of New York I should have a fleet of steam-fishing trawlers owned by the city, and I would keep New York's millions supplied with fresh sea food, distributed from municipal markets scattered all over this huge metropolis. The ocean produces an inexhaustible supply of the finest food, and if we had a government of men instead of boobs sea food could be on every table in the land. But the cities mustn't move neither must the government. The individual pirate must be allowed to rob the people, otherwise we'd be infringing on the rights (rights mind you) of industrial robbers and commercial hold-up men. The private individual must be allowed to have his profit even though humanity in the mass starves to death. What a wonderful people we are, and we actually have the audacity to think we are civilized, when as a matter of fact we are only crazyized. Nellie, I am very much interested in the crop your father raises. You say he is a producer of cotton corn and velvet beans. Maybe he has some mercerized tomatoes and some crepe-de-chine cabbage. You see living with a bunch of girls I'm quite an expert in dress goods. Well, if anyone can raise cotton corn, I should think that Alabama would be the place to do it. It's time the South diversified its crops anyway. If the South had only raised a little more corn and a little less cotton this year it would have been better for all concerned. The fact that nobody knew that war was going to break out is quite beside the matter. No one has any right to take chances in this world, for we never can tell what a day may bring forth, and we've no right to put all our eggs in one basket, far better even to carry a few in our shoes. Life is too full of uncertainties to depend on one crop or one thing, and that is why I commend your father for raising cotton corn, for though at a pinch we can go without clothes we cannot go without food. One thing is certain Nellie, Luther Burbank has nothing on your father. By omitting a comma between cotton and corn you have invented a new freak vegetable, confectionary or whatever you call it, that is going to startle the world. It is not often one can grow food and clothing on one stalk, but you have accomplished it, Nellie, and I congratulate you.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for 15 months if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended two full years beyond date of expiration, if you remit 35 cents.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's 15-months subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for 15 months. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All these League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for December

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Written references from postmaster or physician must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

William T. Harrah, Backus, W. Va. Has broken back. Wife dead. Has three little children. No means of support. Very worthy case. They need clothing and fuel. Your aid alone enables them to exist through the winter. Send this afflicted family some cheer. James Allen, South Solon, Ohio. Suffers from tuberculosis of right thigh bone. Unable to do any work. Has wife and family, the latter too young to be of any assistance. James is a worthy soul. Send this little family something that will make their Christmas worth while. John T. Hoyle, Kings Mountain, N. C. Crippled from locomoter ataxia and spinal trouble for sixteen years. Unable to walk. Has no means of support. His is a sad, hopeless case, and his Christmas will be a sorry one unless you send him some cheer. Highly recommended. Mrs. Mary A. Reynolds, Shuff, R. R. 1, Box 36, Va. poor sick widow, with five children, all too young to be of assistance. She has been bedridden for nearly five years. Do something to brighten this home at Christmas, and help make them forget their troubles for one day at least. L. B. Tinsley, 1645 Washington Ave., Huntington, W. Va. Has broken back. Wife and two little boys. His wife does her best to keep the home going, but it is a hard struggle. Remember them in your Christmas giving. Lafayette Swanson, Boomer, N. C. Paralyzed from neck down, caused by being thrown from wagon by runaway team ten years ago. Is absolutely helpless. His wife tries to support the family and also nurse her sick husband, a task utterly beyond her strength. Don't forget them please. James Gilliam, Klondike, Tenn. Helpless invalid for thirty-eight years. His wife is worn out nursing him and trying to keep the home going. Send these poor struggling souls some cheer. Highly recommended. Rosa A. Joyce, Spencer, Va. Invalid for many years. Aged mother her only support. Needs food and medicine. Will someone send her the wherewithal to procure both. Arthur Williams, Tylertown, Miss. Invalid. Send him some cheer. Mrs. Harriet Tira, Concord, Ky. Widow, seventy-eight years of age. No means of support. Send this poor old soul some sunshine. J. A. Wolfe, Bancroft, W. Va. Do something to help them. Junius Thompson, Le Roy, Ill. McLain Co. Little boy, partially paralyzed. Parents very poor. Send him some Christmas cheer, and something that will amuse the little fellow. M. D. Ross, Hallstead, Pa. Paralyzed. Thirty-three years of age. Would like letters and postal cards only. Claud Shifflet, Richmond, Ky. Helpless little boy. Parents poor. Send him some toys to help brighten his Christmas.

Christmas will be a hollow mockery to these poor souls unless you dig down in your pockets and give them that which buys bread and fuel and pays rent. Don't leave all the giving to a few. Do your part. A Merry Christmas to you all. God bless everyone of you. Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

NEW EDITION Uncle Charlie's Story Book

51st Birthday Souvenir

A Beautiful New Edition of Uncle Charlie's Story Book is now offered as a souvenir of his fifty-first birthday which occurred September 25th. This splendid book of 157 pages printed in good, clear type on fine paper, was gotten up by Uncle Charlie regardless of trouble and expense as a worthy memorial of his fiftieth birthday a year ago.

Besides six unique stories, a dramatic sketch and personal memoirs and thrilling incidents of his remarkable life, all from his inspired pen, there are chapters by "Billy the Goat" and Maria which throw interesting side lights on his character and let you into the mysteries of his daily life. Illustrated with new pictures of him and Maria and Billy.

The immense popularity of this book has exhausted the previous editions and this handsome new edition has been printed to meet the continued large demand for it.

This edition is limited, so this may be your last chance to obtain a copy. Every home should have one.

FREE Premium Offer

It is bound in two styles, both handsome and either good enough. One in heavy, fancy opal blue paper covers known as "cloth of gold paper," will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of two new subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, or for your own 2-year renewal at 30 cents and one 25-cent subscription, 55 cents in all.

The other, beautifully bound in lilac silk with stiff covers, will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of four subscriptions at 25 cents each, one dollar in all, or for your own 2-year renewal at 30 cents and three 25-cent subscriptions, $1.05 in all.

In either offer 2-year renewals at 30 cents each will count the same as 15-month subscriptions at 25 cents each.

This offer holds good while the supply of books holds out.

Probably this is the last edition that will ever be printed.

BE QUICK and secure a copy while they last.

These are the best and most costly premiums that we give for such size clubs.

Relief For Rupture Without Operation

We Allow A 60-Day Test—Entirely At Our Own Risk—To Prove It

No longer any need to drag through life at the mercy of leg-strap and spring trusses. No reason in the world for letting them force you to undergo a dangerous operation,

Away With Leg-Strap and Spring Trusses

So far as we know, our guaranteed rupture holder is the only thing of any kind for rupture that you can get on 60 days trial—the only thing we know of good enough to stand such a long and thorough test. It's the famous Cluthe Automatic Massaging Truss—made on an absolutely new principle—has 18 patented features. Self-adjusting. Does away with the misery of wearing belts, leg-straps and springs. Guaranteed to hold at all times—including when you are working, taking a bath, etc. Has cured in case after case that seemed hopeless.

Write for Free Book of Advice—Cloth-bound, 104 pages. Explains the dangers of operation. Shows just what's wrong with elastic and spring trusses, and why drugstores should no more be allowed to fit trusses than to perform operations. Exposes the humbugs—shows how old-fashioned worthless trusses are sold under false and misleading names. Tells all about the care and attention we give you. Endorsements from over 5000 people, including physicians. Write to-day—find out how you can prove every word we say by making a 60 day test without risking a penny.

COMFORT wants to give free to your little girl and every little girl this handsome doll Family stamped in beautiful colors on strong cloth with full directions so that you can cut them out, stuff and sew them up in less than ten minutes. We show only one doll in the picture but we actually give you three dolls in all. We have named them "Golden Locks" and her two little twin sisters. "Golden Locks" is almost as big as a real baby, for she stands one and one half feet high and her cute little sisters are over half a foot high. These dolls cannot be broken no matter how much they are thrown around or dropped on the floor and you can make them bend their arms and legs, stand up and sit down in a chair and assume all sorts of natural positions. They have beautiful golden hair which hangs in the dearest curls you ever saw and fastened with a bright red ribbon bow that cannot get lost or become untied, handsome red cheeks, rosy lips and lovely blue eyes which smile at you in such a life-like way that you would almost think they were ready to speak and say "Mama." As shown in above illustration they also are dressed in dainty lace-trimmed underwear with bright red stockings and black buttoned boots. The three dolls together—"Golden Locks" and the two sweet Baby Sisters—make the cutest and prettiest Doll Family any little girl ever had to play with. They are lot better for the little folks than the more expensive bisque and china dolls because they will not break or snarl their pretty hair or lose their eyes. There is no little girl who will not instantly fall in love with this beautiful Doll Family and spend many happy hours with it, so we hope that every mother who reads this offer will take advantage of it at once. We will send you all three dolls—free by Parcel Post prepaid on the terms of the following special offer.

Offer 463 A. For one new 15-month subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you all three dolls free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer No. 463 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you all three dolls free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 463). Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

J. M. L., Hughwit, Okla.—A good many COMFORT readers have asked us about fresh-water pearls, particularly as to their value and to whom to apply to sell them. The fresh-water pearl is nothing like so valuable as the sea pearl and most of those reported to us by readers are hardly worth bothering about. But if anybody has a large, fine one, or a large quantity of smaller ones, we suggest that he write to Tiffany & Co., New York, N. Y., a reliable firm and an authority in all sorts of jewels, for information and possible sale.

A. M. C., Glencoe, Okla.—Old books and other old things about the house that you wish to dispose of, unless they are rare antiques, can much better be got rid of in your own locality than by sending them away. Dealers at a distance must see what they buy, they pay very small prices, and you have the freight to pay. Sell your books to your neighbors at any price you can get.

Mrs. X. Y. Z., McDonald, Tenn.—Tiffany & Co., New York City are reliable, and any old gold, or silver that you may have to sell can be safely entrusted to them. Write to them asking the price of old gold and tell them what weight of it you have. They can't afford to bother with a few cents' worth. You ought to be able to sell it to a local jeweler. We think old gold is worth about seventy-five cents a pennyweight, anywhere and everywhere.

O. F. C., Waukena, Cal.—Don't attempt a medical course on an eighth grade education. We have too many ignorant doctors already. Some knowledge of Latin should be obligatory. Also correct spelling is a necessity and you lack that very greatly. A doctor who spelled "answer" "ancer" and "Bureau" "Bereau." wouldn't keep many first-class patients, we fancy, even if he ever got one.

Miss I. V. R., Mt. Vernon, Ohio.—If we knew the address of a theater or vaudeville manager we would not give it to you. You know nothing of the stage—if you did you would not be asking us the question—and it is just such girls as you who are ruined by the stage. If you need work, get it where there is less temptation and where your qualifications better fit.

Mrs. C. H. D., Port Huron, Mich.—First off, you must be careful in removing feathers from fowls not to soil them any more than is possible. They may be cleansed by exposing them to the sunshine or placing them in an oven to dry and then beating them to remove the dust. When really dirty they may be cleansed with lime water, or better with a weak solution of ordinary cooking soda in water. After careful washing rinse in clear, cold water and dry as before.

T. W. C., Dawson Springs, Ky.—The hypnotic power, so-called, is very largely a gift and cannot be acquired by most people. Those who have it to a slight degree may improve it by training and practise.

Miss E. M., Hollidaysburg, Pa.—It is an excellent idea to have pledges for boys to sign against liquor drinking and it would be a good idea to extend them to cigarette smoking and other bad habits and, while you are about it, pledges for the improvement of girls along various lines might be of benefit to them and the entire community, the same as with the boys. You cannot get ready-made pledges exactly as you want them, so your best plan is to write the pledges exactly as you want them to be and have your local printer print them for you. The cost will be small and you will get just what you want. Other COMFORT readers interested in work of this kind follow suit.

E. A. T., Meridian, Miss.—You don't read your Bible very closely or you would not be asking about the names of Adam and "Eave." However, we may reply that the name Adam means red, or red earth and Eve means life. The characters or characteristics, rather, of the individuals gave them their names. So Cain received his name because he was a blacksmith and Abel, meaning a meadow or grassy place, had his name because he was a farmer or shepherd. Names were thus given in the beginning to men and women to distinguish one from another and in time these names became part of the individuals, so to say, and were transmitted from father to son. Johnson, Stevenson, and such names ending in "son" being the names of sons of men named John, Steven and so on. "Ton" as the ending of a name, meant of the town. Black, White, Gray and those names were originally to indicate some characteristic of color in the person. Smith, Carpenter, Farmer, Taylor, Baker, and that class were given from the occupation of the individual. The derivation of many surnames is not known, but in the majority of cases they are quite apparent, as in those we have given. Take a list of names of people you know and figure them out for yourself. Borrow a cyclopedia from one of your neighbors and read up on names and nomenclature.

J. W. H., Louisburg, N. C.—A very ordinary intelligence should know that a two-year correspondence course in civil engineering, or anything else, is not equal to a complete course in a technical school. You might get a fairly good position after the two-year course and by continued study rise still higher, but a graduate of a technical school, if he has ability, may take an advanced position at the beginning, or as soon as he has got bridle-wise to the practical work. The two-year course will give you a start that with hard work and study may lead to the top, but it is not an easy climb. The really good things in this life you don't get easy and education is one of the best things. If you expect to be a first-class civil engineer you will have to work for it and work hard. You might try the course by correspondence and see how you progress. As much depends on you as on the course. We like to see our COMFORT boys ambitious, but we want them to understand clearly that they must work for what they get.

Miss B. K., Prattsville, Ark.—It is not in the way you boil eggs that the shell is prevented from sticking, but in the way you shell them afterwards. To get the shell off clear, crack the eggshell first and then roll the egg under your hand on a table until the entire shell is broken into small bits. Then you can skin it clean as a hound's tooth. (2) Boil your cabbage in a thoroughly clean enameled vessel and it will not turn red.

Studious Boy, Hawley, Minn.—Get a list of the books you want from one of your local teachers and also get the address of booksellers in St. Paul and Minneapolis, if anyone can give them to you. If not, write to Rand, McNally & Co., and A. C. McClurg & Co., both of Chicago, stating what you want and get lists and prices.

Miss E. DeB., Midland, Ga.—With no local habitation known it may be difficult to locate in the U. S. persons of any particular name. It might be done through the Census Office. Write to Superintendent U. S. Census, Washington, D. C. for information. Write to Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago, about the Duchess.

D. E. O., San Saba, Texas.—Fowls—but you shouldn't spell it "fowels"—have the sense of smell as is shown by the presence of nasal vents in all of them, and they are not guided entirely by sight and hearing. All living things haven't the sense of smell, but the vast majority of them have—all in fact except the very lowest orders, and even some of them may have. It is not a sense whose existence may be so easily determined as are sight and hearing.

T. B., Richmond, Va.—A very appropriate closing for a letter to any person of any distinction is "Very respectfully," or "Very truly," though if you wish to use the old Virginia style of "I am, sir, or madam, most respectfully your humble and obedient servant," you may do so. Either that or any of its numerous variations are proper enough, but somewhat archaic, not to say obsolete, in this less polite age. A simple Christmas card will be a sufficient token of appreciation to a person of distinction, not your personal friend, but associated in a semi-literary way.

Mrs. O. H., Creston, Mont.—In every state, we suppose, there are schools which give boys and girls a chance to earn their education and learn some useful trade, but these schools are not listed among the great schools and they are not known far outside of their state boundaries. Any educator in your state could tell you of any such schools in Montana. The Montana State College at Bozeman might answer your purpose. Write to James M. Hamilton, President, for information. (2) We know of no firms employing seamstresses outside of their own immediate localities. It does not pay.

Miss C. G., Hilbert, Wis.—We have not observed the initials you mention on any dimes in our possession, but do not listen to the stories that they are put there by a manufacturing firm in order to give its machine to any person getting the dimes that spell the firm's name. Such lettering by private parties would constitute mutilation of the government coin and is a penitentiary offense. It might be good advertising, but is altogether too dangerous to undertake. COMFORT readers take notice if they hear this dime story.

C. J., Simpsonville, S. C.—Before getting addresses of hospitals where you might wish to enter to become a nurse, find out from one of your local physicians if you have the necessary qualifications to become a nurse. Most persons do not and without these qualifications it is a waste of time to make any effort in that direction. If you want information further write to Chautauqua Training School for Nurses, Jamestown, N. Y. Other COMFORT girls who think they want to become nurses, please cut this out and follow its instructions.

Miss M. D. C., Pittville, Cal.—The case you present has no legal status, because a mule that would let itself be kicked to death by a horse, or any other hoofed creature, would have absolutely no value to warrant a suit at law. Now a horse kicked to death by a mule would constitute a fair case of litigation, but never the other way. You must have got the parties reversed.

We have received numerous additional inquiries about spineless cactus of which information was given in November issue. If inquier will write to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for special information known it may be difficult to locate in the U.

The Battle of The Cows

A Singular Contest That Occurs Each Year in Switzerland During August

THIS extraordinary battle takes place every season with the Swiss cattle, which come from all parts, leave the valleys near Arolla in a great herd, to feed on the mountain sides. The object of the conflict is to decide which cow shall be queen.

The fight is usually witnessed by crowds of people, amongst them many tourists. The great herd of cows cover a space fully five hundred yards square, fight fiercely and each cow as soon as vanquished, is led off the field to a place where she can observe the fray.

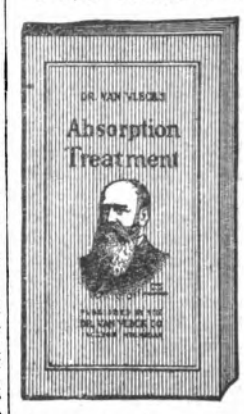
When evening comes the only occupants of the improvised arena, are about two dozen unconquered cows, which pace the turf proudly.

Then the queen of last year is led into the field. One by one the other cows are permitted to advance against her, and one by one she puts them out of business.

Then the herders come forward and hang about the conquering animal's neck a bell, much more handsome and twice as large as that gracing the neck of any other of the cows—this being the outward and visible sign of queenship.

No sooner has this unique coronation ceremony taken place than all the other cows, which number many hundreds, are escorted forward and grouped about their queen, who with much dignity, leads them off up the mountain path toward their new feeding place. The herdsmen take hardly any part in these fights.

The cows' horns are blunted so they are not able to gore each other, but some of the battles are terrible.



When the herd is unusually large the fighting to decide upon a queen sometimes lasts for a week.

FREAK CALF.—William Wilson, a farmer of Bedford, Ind., is the possessor of a freak calf. The animal, apparently healthy, is unable to walk, its movements being restricted to a jumping motion. It was born without a tail, the nearest approach to that being a hairy growth, similar in form and size to that displayed by a rabbit. Hundreds of people have been attracted to the Wilson farm by the rabbit-like calf.

CRUEL PILES

Write today for this valuable, illustrated

PILE BOOK FREE

Describes a simple method by which thousands of unfortunate sufferers from this malignant disease have found relief and happiness at little cost.

The information given in this Free Book has saved hundreds from costly operations and years of cruel pain. It is illustrated with color plates and describes in detail a subject little understood by most, yet of untold importance to anyone having any kind of rectal trouble.

Dr. Van Vleck, ex-surgeon U. S. Army, after forty years study, found a method of treatment which brings prompt relief to sufferers from Piles, Fissure, Fistula, Constipation, and all Rectal Troubles, no matter how severe. No knife, no pain, no doctor bills—just a simple home treatment which can be tried by anyone without risking the loss of a penny. The publishers of this little book have received hundreds of letters telling of cures by this remarkably effective system after everything else, including costly and dangerous operations, had failed, even after 30 and 40 years of suffering. The milder cases are usually controlled in a single day. Send the coupon today for this Book and learn about these valuable truths for yourself.

Sister: Read My Free Offer!

I am a woman.
I know a woman's trials.
I know her need of sympathy and help.

If you, my sister, are unhappy because of ill-health, if you feel unfit for household duties, social pleasures, or daily employment, write and tell me just how you suffer, and ask for my free ten days' trial of a home treatment suited to your needs. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any man. I want to tell you how to cure yourself at home at a cost of about 12 cents a week.

If you suffer from women's peculiar ailments causing pain in the head, back, or bowels, feeling of weight and dragging down sensation, falling or displacement of pelvic organs, causing kidney and bladder weakness or constipation and piles, painful or irregular periods, catarrhal conditions and discharges, extreme nervousness, depressed spirits, melancholy, desire to cry, fear of something evil about to happen, creeping feeling along the spine, palpitation, hot flashes, weariness, sallow complexion with dark circles under the eyes, pain in the left breast or general feeling that life is not worth living.

I INVITE YOU TO SEND TODAY FOR MY FREE TEN DAYS' TREATMENT

and learn how these ailments can be easily and surely conquered at home without the dangers and expense of an operation. When you are cured, and able to enjoy life again, you can pass the good word along to some other sufferer. My home treatment is for young or old. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain how to overcome green sickness (chlorosis), irregularities, headaches, and lassitude in young women and restore them to plumpness and health. Tell me if you are worried about your daughter. Remember it costs you nothing to give my home treatment a ten days' trial, and does not interfere with daily work. If health is worth asking for, then accept my generous offer and write for the free treatment, including my illustrated booklet, "Women's Own Medical Adviser." I will send all in plain wrappers postpaid. To save time, you can cut out this offer, mark your feelings, and return to me. Send today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a 15-month subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for fifteen months.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. S. N., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving a husband and children, her estate, after payment of debts and administration expenses, would go one half to the surviving husband and the other half in equal shares to her children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parents' share; we do not think she can cut off her husband's share by will, without his written consent; we do not think his share is affected by the fact that her children are by a former husband.

Mrs. B. H. L., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will and leaving a husband and children, the husband would receive an estate by curtesy in her real estate of a life use thereof and would be entitled to cut enough timber for his uses about the place and for firewood, but could not legally sell the timber or give same away for other purposes; we think he could be enjoined by the proper court action from giving timber to one of the children for use somewhere else than the necessary use upon the place. After the death of the husband we think such woman's real estate would be divided in equal shares among her children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parents' share, unless such child survived the mother and died before the termination of the husband's estate by curtesy, in which event it would go and be divided as such child's estate depending upon who was left and depending upon whether such child left a will. We do not think the husband can hold curtesy against children of a former husband to whom such lands might descend.

Happy Jack, North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the marriage without the parents' or guardian's consent of a female under the age of consent is a voidable marriage, and can be set aside in the proper action brought for that purpose; we also think that the parents' consent would be necessary to procure a marriage license, and that a false statement for that purpose is punishable under the laws of your state.

S. M., Montana.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man or woman, leaving no will, and leaving no descendants, the survivor would receive one half of the real estate, the balance going to decedent's parents, brothers or sisters or their descendants, if any, and if none, the whole estate would go to the survivor, if decedent leaves descendants' the surviving widow's or husband's share would be reduced depending upon the number of children or lines of descent left. We think property owned by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety would upon the death of one all go to the survivor. We cannot form an opinion as to just what kind of an estate is created in the deed you mention without seeing the deed.

Mrs. E. L. F., Kentucky.—Under the laws of Ohio, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no descendants, such property as came to him by descent, or devise or deed of gift of an ancestor would go to his wife for the term of her natural life with remainder over to his collateral relatives of the blood of the ancestor from whom decedent received the property. We think if the property came to decedent in some other way the law, governing the disposition, is different.

Subscriber, Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all contracts or agreements for the purchase or sale of real estate must be in writing, and that no damages could be recovered for the failure to carry out a verbal contract or agreement of that nature.

Mrs. J. F. A., Iowa.—Under the laws of Nebraska, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his lands would descend one quarter part to the widow if such widow is not the parent of all the children and there be one or more children or the issue of one or more deceased children surviving, and that after some small allowances to the widow she would receive the same portion of decedent's personal property; we think the widow's share would be increased in cases where she is the mother of all the children surviving of the decedent, her exact portion running from one third in cases where there is more than one child or descendants of one child left surviving the deceased.

Miss I. A., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman holds her real estate and personal property and all the profits therefrom absolutely as her separate property, and they are not liable for the debts of her husband, but she cannot alien or encumber her real estate, nor enter into any executory contract therefor unless her husband joins in the conveyance or contract, but may sell her personality without his consent. We have not received the copy of the deed you mention and cannot form an opinion upon the rights of the various parties thereunder. We think a parent can be compelled to support his minor children who are unable to provide for themselves and can be punished for his cruel treatment of them. We think the husband can be compelled to support his wife and can be punished for brutal treatment of her. We think complaints of this nature should be made to your nearest magistrate or justice of the peace or to the prosecuting attorney of your county.

Mrs. B. H., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, the widow would take all personal property which came to the husband in right of the marriage and also one half of the real and personal estate of which the husband was owner at the time of his death, provided she makes a written election to take such property subject to the payment of the husband's debts. This election must be in writing, acknowledged as in the case of a deed, and recorded in the county where letters of administration were granted. If this election is not made the widow's share would be reduced if husband left parent, brother or sister or their descendants. We are of the opinion that if the husband desires all the property to go to his widow he should have a will to that effect.

Late Popular Copyrighted Books

COMFORT can now offer its book-loving readers a splendid variety of the most popular books of the day. If you will glance through the list of titles you will recognize many of the greatest literary successes of the past two years. Some of them have been dramatized and played in the big theatres of Boston, New York, Chicago and other large cities. Only a year ago these books were sold for $1.25 and $1.50 each. Now that they are in their second edition they do not cost so much to publish, furthermore by purchasing a large quantity of them we secured a special low price. This enables us to give your choice of any of these late popular copyrighted books on one of the most liberal club offers ever made. This is the kind of live, up-to-date fiction that you want to read. They are books that every man, woman, boy or girl should read. They are books of the present and not of the past. They are stories of the 20th century. There is not a sensational book in the whole lot—none that you would not be willing to have the young people read. We offer a large variety of titles for you to choose from—stories of the city—of love and romance—of the mountains—of the plains—adventures on the ranch, in the big woods, in the frozen north—in fact, here are books to suit the taste of every member of the family from the youngest to the oldest. They are large 12 mo. volumes of uniform size, printed on good book paper, strongly and durably bound in handsome cloth covers, most of which are illustrated and all of which have the title stamped on side and back in either gold or colored inks. They are illustrated throughout, none of them contain less than 240 pages; most of them have 300 to 350 pages. Now is the time for you to lay in your supply of winter reading and here is your opportunity to get it free. We will give you your choice of any of these late, popular copyrighted books upon the terms of the following free offers.

YOUR CHOICE OF THESE BOOKS FREE!

FOR A club of three 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you any one book free by Parcel Post prepaid. Or we will send you any two books for a club of five 15-month subscriptions at 25 cents each; any three books for a club of seven; or any four books, for a club of nine. When ordering be sure to write very plainly the title or titles wanted. All books are sent by Parcel Post prepaid.

Thousands Of Dollars In Cash Prizes!

Start NOW If You Want To Win YOUR Share Of The Prize Money Which We Will Distribute Among COMFORT'S Readers This Season. Contest Is Now On So GET BUSY!

EACH AND every month of the six months beginning with November 1914 and ending with April 1915 we shall award a series of Cash Prizes to those of our readers who send in the most 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT during each month. At the close of the contest April 1915 we shall further distribute 44 Grand Cash Prizes ranging from $5.00 to $150.00 to the 44 contestants who send in the most subscriptions during the entire six months. Also we shall pay 525 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each to women who enter the contest and fail to win a regular monthly prize. The prizes for each month will be paid on the 8th day of the month following and the names of the prize winners will be announced in COMFORT month by month. Read all about our surprisingly liberal prize offer explained below and enter now for this month's prizes.

You Cannot Lose—You Get Your Premiums Sure

From now on any club you send in will bring you a fine premium sure and may help win a Cash Prize for you also because the same clubs you get up for any of our premiums are also placed to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and Grand Prizes too, if you request it. It only remains for you to send in enough subscriptions to win a Cash Prize any one month or each month for the six months. And remember that every Monthly Prize you win puts you just so much nearer one of the Grand Prizes to be awarded at the close of the contest April 1915. And you still get your regular club premiums just the same. All this money which you may easily win if you will but make the effort is extra and in addition to the premiums which you may select from our catalogue or any issue of COMFORT and which will be sent to you immediately upon receipt of every club you send in.

How Monthly Prizes Double

If you win a monthly prize one month we pay you at once; if you win any monthly prize the next month we pay you double the amount of your second month's prize, and we will continue to pay you double each successive month that you continue to win any monthly prize. The doubling begins with December.

How Monthly Prizes Thribble

If you win the same Monthly Prize three months in succession we pay you double the amount the second month and three times the amount the third month and we continue to pay you three times the amount each successive month that you continue to win the same monthly prize. If, however, you should win the first monthly prize each month for the whole six months, then we will pay you four times the amount of that prize the fourth month, five times the amount the fifth month and six times the amount the sixth month. The thribbling begins with January.

The Consolation Prizes

In addition to the regular Monthly Prizes we shall also in November award 75 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each, and in the months of December, January, February and March 100 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each and in April 50 Consolation Prizes of $1.00 each to such women entering the Monthly Contests of those months and failing to win as we think worthy of reward for their unsuccessful efforts. Remember however that these Consolation Prizes do not double or thribble like the Monthly Prizes.

Opening and Closing Dates

Each Monthly Contest (after November) opens on the first day of the month and ends at midnight of the last day of the same month. If you mail Subscriptions on the last day of a month they will be counted to your credit in the contest for that month, providing the postmark on the envelope shows it. This gives an equal opportunity to all of our readers who enter these contests no matter how far off they live. The monthly prizes, each month, are paid to those who send in the most 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT during the particular month for which the prizes are offered, the first monthly prize for the largest number of subscriptions, the second Monthly Prize for the next largest number, and so on down the list for the month.

917 Cash Prizes In All!

EVERY ONE of the Cash Prizes offered in this contest will actually be paid to the men, women, boys and girls who enter and who send in a sufficient number of subscriptions to COMFORT before April 30, 1915. No partiality will be shown to any contestant. Every subscription sent in by you will, if you so desire, be placed to your credit on the Monthly Prizes and Grand Prizes also and whatever prize you win each month will be paid to you in money promptly at the end of the month in which you win it. And at the close of the contest if there is also a Grand Cash Prize coming to you it will be paid to you immediately after the closing date. There will be no unfair treatment, no waiting, no disappointments for you in this contest. You will be given a square deal first, last and all the time. But when sending your subscriptions be sure to say you want them entered to your credit on the cash prizes otherwise we will not know that you are in the contest. How The Grand Prizes Are to be Awarded

Promptly at the close of the contest April 30, 1915 we shall also award 44 Grand Prizes as published elsewhere on this page. The Capital Grand Prize of $150.00 will go to the contestant who sends in the largest number of 25-cent subscriptions from the first day of October 1914 to the last day of next April. The second Grand Prize of $100 will go to the contestant who sends in the next largest number and so on. Remember these Grand Prizes come on top of the Monthly Prizes and the premiums that you are sure of anyway. Please bear in mind that you do not have to stay in the contest the entire six months in order to win a Grand Cash Prize. In addition to your Monthly Prize you may also win a Grand Prize in a single month—the first month, last month or any other month. Several contestants have done this in our previous contests.

Small Clubs Win The Prizes

Remember that small clubs win the Cash Prizes in these contests. Contrary to what you may have believed and what some people may try to tell you, you don't have to send in big clubs and lots of clubs in order to win the Monthly Prizes and perhaps a Grand Prize also in addition to your regular club premiums. Lots of people in our last year's contest carried off prizes month after month with clubs as small as 15 subscriptions, 20 subscriptions and so on up to 25 subscriptions. You are just as likely to be as fortunate in this contest, but of course you realize that the more subscriptions you send in each month, the better will be your chances.

You May win as Much as $780

The contestant who wins the first Monthly Prize each month for the entire six months will of course also win the Capital Grand Prize of $150.00 thereby winning a total of $780.00. To this fortunate contestant we will pay $30.00 for November, $60.00 for December, $90.00 for January, $120 for February, $150 for March and $180 for April which amounts to $630 and this added to the Capital Grand Prize of $150 makes the splendid sum of $780.

Rules and Conditions

1. Send subscription clubs, large or small, as often as you like. Name the club premiums you want.
2. In mailing subscriptions intended for the prize competition, be sure to address them to COMFORT Prize Department, Augusta, Maine, or we shall not know they are for the prize contest.
3. Subscriptions mailed on last day of a month will be counted into that month's contest provided the postmark on the envelope shows it. This makes it fair for all, no matter how far off they live.
4. The prizes will be awarded on the basis of fifteen-month subscriptions, but other subscriptions will be accepted and counted in this prize contest as follows: A 50-cent three-year subscription equals two fifteen-month subscriptions. One two-year renewal equals one fifteen-month subscription. So send in either kind of COMFORT subscriptions or renewals and they will all count.
5. In case of a tie, the prize or prizes for which contestants are tied will be divided equally between them. Thus, if two are tied for first prize, we shall add first and second prizes together and give half of the total to each, and double the share of either contestant entitled to double.

Mail The Coupon With A Small Club

You will earn a fine premium and you may start a Cash Prize your way also simply by sending us the coupon printed at the left along with two or more subscriptions to COMFORT. Then follow up your first club with another club as soon as possible. We will send you the premiums which you select from any issue of COMFORT or from our regular catalogue just as fast as you send in your clubs. They alone will more than pay you for your trouble. But remember that you may also win a Cash Prize every month. Start a club today. You have everything to gain and nothing to lose. You cannot possibly lose because you are SURE to get a premium anyway for every club you send in. Start now and win a December prize and a Grand Prize too.

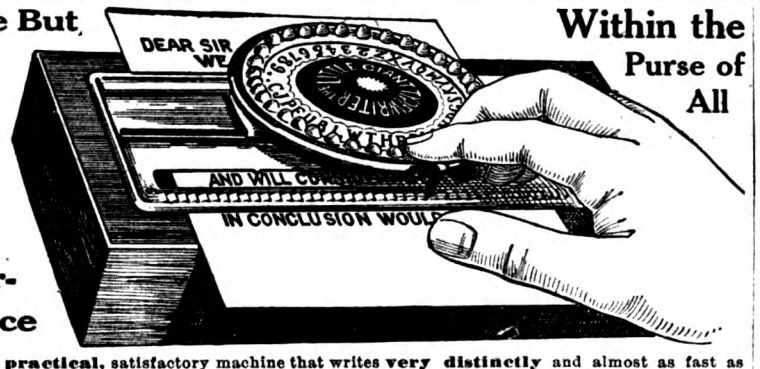
Engraved Gold Bracelet



THIS Round Bracelet with artistic engraving and unique Spring Fastening is the most attractive pattern we have seen this season. Not too large but large enough and as it is perfectly round, it fits well and becomes all ages and wears like Solid Gold. There is a demand for bracelets of enormous size, but this style is medium large and nearly three inches in diameter; we consider it a beautiful pattern. This bracelet is the very latest style so you will want one while fashionable, and as we guarantee fit and wear, you need not hesitate to order.

Special Offer: For one new 15-months subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents or for your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents extra (35 cents in all) we will send you this Bracelet free by parcel post prepaid.

A Real Typewriter For Real Work!

Small In Size But Perfect In Operation. Adapted To Either Personal Or Business Correspondence

Within the Purse of All

THIS is not a toy, but a practical, satisfactory machine that writes very distinctly and almost as fast as some typewriters costing $10.00 and more. It is a great deal larger than it appears to be in the above illustration, has every letter in the alphabet, all the numerals from one to ten, and the punctuation marks. You can use any size letter paper on this machine up to 5 inches in width and any length desired. For personal or business correspondence, making out statements, bills, addressing envelopes, etc., this machine answers every purpose. It is very easy to understand and operate, in fact a child can write on it after a few hours' practice. It is practically indestructible as it is made all of metal and positively cannot get out of order. We are sure that this typewriter will give the best of satisfaction because it is a real machine that will do real work. We will send you this practical typewriter guaranteed to be exactly as above illustrated and described with full directions for operating and a good supply of the best quality copying ink, carefully packed in a strong compact box upon the terms of the following

Club Offer. For a club of only four 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-years subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this typewriter and complete outfit free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 586.

Comb and Brush

That Will Stand Long, Hard Use

The bristles of this brush are strongly embedded in aluminum-like, bright metal which has a silver luster, so they will stand no end of water without falling out or the back of the brush cracking.

We offer this special premium with confidence, knowing the most exacting people will be pleased to own a good brush and comb that will last for years and keep sweet and clean. The brush is nine inches long and two and one half inches wide of rich, black, ebonized finish, pure white, well filled, rows of bristles held firmly in place by the metal which prevents dust and germs from collecting around the bristles. Wet the brush and it cannot spoil or sour like ordinary ones. The comb, seven and one half inches long and one and one half inches wide, with fine and coarse teeth, and being made of special black secret process material, is well named Bull Dog or Unbreakable.

This Premium No. 263 safely packed and sent by Parcel Post for a club of only two 15-months subscribers to COMFORT at 25 cents each.

Whose Little Girl Wants ME? I Am The Cutest Sweetest Baby Doll In Toyland And You Can Have Me FREE!

YES, this beautiful, curly-haired doll is free to any little girl and on such liberal terms that we expect to give away thousands of them during the next few months. Don't think she is anywhere near as small as she looks to be in the picture for she stands nearly a foot and a quarter high. She has a real kid body and her beautiful head is almost indestructible because it is made of bisque. You can make her stand up or sit down in a chair, or bend over or assume all sorts of natural positions because her arms are jointed at shoulder and elbow and her legs at hip and knee. When you lie her down she closes her eyes and goes to sleep and when you pick her up she is wide awake again. Her beautiful brown hair hangs in luxuriant curls, her eyes are blue as the sky, she has real eyelashes—not the "make-believe" kind—and taken altogether she is certainly the cutest and sweetest baby doll in all toyland. With exception of her handsome black openwork lace stockings and cunning little slippers with bow and buckle she comes to you undressed so that you can make your own dresses for her and dress and undress her to your heart's content. Fathers and Mothers—just look at this beautiful doll in the picture as she stands smiling with arms outstretched waiting for someone to pick her up, hug her, kiss her and put on her gay little dress! Don't you think your little girl would just love to have her for her own? We will send her to you free packed in a strong box so she cannot possibly get broken if you will accept the terms of the following special offer.

For Only Six Subscriptions!

FOR A club of only six 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each we will send you this handsome Doll exactly as described by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 466.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE! This is the same doll which we formerly offered for a club of four. Owing to the scarcity and high prices of dolls brought about by the European War, we are obliged to raise the offer to a club of six. Please bear this fact in mind when ordering the above doll and remember that our former offer has been withdrawn and that from now on we cannot give this doll for a club of less than six 15-month subscriptions at 25 cents each or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each.

FREE Four Beautiful Ferns
EVERY ONE GUARANTEED TO GROW

THERE is nothing that will make your home more bright and cheerful especially through the long winter months to come than beautiful charming ferns and the superb collection we offer you here comprises four of the handsomest, most popular varieties ever grown for house culture. They will thrive beautifully in any dwelling room near a window and require almost no attention except a little sprinkling of water now and then. The same growers who have in the past furnished COMFORT'S famous rose collections are to supply us with these ferns each one of which is guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. Owing to lack of space we are able to illustrate here only one variety "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer each one of which we will briefly describe to you as follows, although no description can convey to you any real idea of their rare beauty.

The "Roosevelt"

This is a new variety recently introduced and one of the finest ferns for house decorative purposes ever grown, of compact vigorous growing habit producing in great numbers wide massive fronds of good length beautifully tapered from base to tip and drooping gracefully over the pot hiding it completely from view. The pinnæ, or leaves, of this magnificent fern are distinctively undulated giving the whole plant a most beautiful wavy appearance. The "Roosevelt" has without exception proved to be the strongest growing fern ever produced and seems to withstand better than any other variety the most unfavorable conditions, while if it is given ordinary care it quickly develops into a specimen of rare beauty.

The "Whitmani"

This charming creation has caused a real sensation among lovers of plants, each frond being as delicate and finely cut as the most perfect ostrich plume by which name this fern is commonly known. It is a very vigorous grower constantly unfolding new fronds from six to eight inches wide of fine feathery foliage entirely distinct from any other variety quickly growing to a width of from ten to twelve inches and of such good substantial texture that it withstands the abuse to which house plants are sometimes subjected. The "Whitmani" is one of the few feathery foliage ferns which everyone can succeed in growing to a superb finished specimen even under the most unfavorable conditions of soil and treatment.

The "Asparagus Plumosus"

There is always a place in every home for this magnificent fern for it is one which really adapts itself to all conditions making the most rapid and vigorous growth with the least care and attention. Its bright, rich green fronds are as fine and delicate as the most beautiful lace by reason of which it is sometimes given the name "lace fern." The rapid sturdy growth of this fern combined with its exquisite lacy foliage makes a plant of such airy grace and value as to be desired by everyone.

"The Boston"

This fern is one of the oldest and best known varieties grown and in the long years of its growth has proved well worthy of a place in every home. It is known by some as the "Fountain Fern" which name is derived from its graceful drooping habit of growth and until the recent production of the "Roosevelt Fern" was acknowledged the finest of its type. It is a very rapid grower producing fronds frequently measuring from six to eight feet long and its freedom of growth without special care has made this fern extremely popular with all who admire beautiful house plants.

Great Japanese Rug about Six Feet Long
Given For a Club of Only Four

This unusual offering was gotten of a large importing house who make a specialty in dealing in big quantities of these Botan or Matting Rugs. It is closely woven of fine Japanese matting and is thus strong and durable. It has an elaborate Oriental design, which is brought out by the bright colors being interwoven with the finely shaded texture of the matting itself, of which our illustration gives but a faint idea. The colors are of such a blend and are so harmonious in the variegated shades of red, blue and green that it is appropriate to use in any room in the house, especially for the chambers or living-room. It will lay closely to the floor or fit nicely over a defaced carpet. They are of such good size, about 72 inches long and thirty-six inches wide, that two of them make a good covering for the floor of a fair sized room. They are a very serviceable rug to use as they do not easily soil and can be readily cleaned with a damp cloth and the color design thus be kept fresh and bright. It is guaranteed to give entire satisfaction and if you once have one of these rugs come into your home you will almost be compelled to get up another club and secure more of them, they are given on such easy terms and are so entirely wearable and give such a fine appearance.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only four 15-months subscribers to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will deliver one of these Rugs by Parcel Post. Prem. No. 420. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Genuine Weatherproof Garment
Utility Coat for Ladies, Misses and Men

Fashioned after the model of a "Great Coat," it covers the entire person from "Head to Foot," affording complete protection from the weather, be it wind or rain. Made of waterproof rubber sheeting, in two colors, Olive Drab or Tan and Gray with Plaid Lining, every seam is both sewed and cemented, has standing Military Collar, two side pockets and five large buttons.

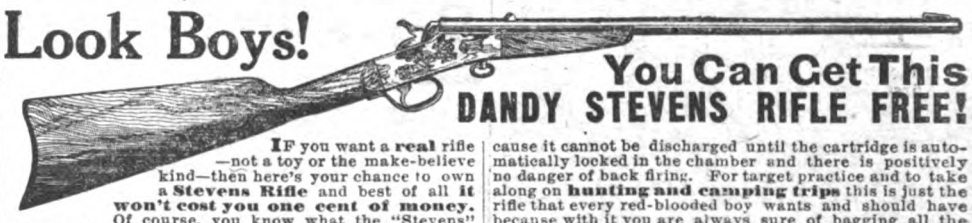
For walking the coat is none too heavy, for riding it is the greatest rain and wind repellant imaginable.



Of late the so-called "rain coat" has been all the rage, they have proven more desirable than so-called cravenetted materials, being lighter in weight.

Every person, especially schoolgirls, should be amply protected from the weather, and this coat provides a garment that covers all the outer clothes, providing warmth and keeping everything dry. Such coats usually sell for $5.00 but we can give them away free for small subscription clubs as we have bought a quantity at great advantage. Read the offer carefully. Premium No. 530.

Club Offer. Send only 12 subscribers to COMFORT at 25c. each for 15 months for one Coat; same will be sent at our expense. You may select Tan or Gray, and please give size, bust measure, required. Address

Girl's Waterproof Cape

A Great PROTECTOR From WIND and RAIN

Made of striped rubberized cloth with suitable lining, and the best feature of this cape is the hood. Girls going to school do not like to carry an umbrella, and this cape can be worn either in hot or cold weather. If in winter a sweater or coat can be worn underneath, and the child is not only dry but perfectly warm. There are two openings in the cape for the arms, but the garment is large enough so the books or packages can be carried underneath, which makes it much better than a Rain Coat. The shoulders are shaped so as to give it a very attractive look. This cape comes in a very dark drab color with lighter drab stripes. They are so pretty any girl will be proud to wear one. Sizes 6 to 14 years. When ordering better order it larger than necessary so to have it of sufficient size to go over a heavy coat or other garments. Boys can easily get up clubs and thus get one of these Rain Capes for their sisters. Girls like to get subscribers to COMFORT where they can so easily earn such a sensible premium so as to keep warm and dry during the rainy season. We are prepared to fill all orders promptly.

Genuine Gold-Filled Ladies' Rings!

WE show here six of the latest styles in ladies and girls' rings. They are not solid gold rings but they are genuine gold filled so that they are just as handsome and will wear just as well as if they were solid gold. They are beautifully made and finished and set with imt. stones so exquisitely cut and mounted that only an expert can distinguish them from the real gems which would cost from $5.00 to $25.00. Remember that these are not cheap "electro-plated" rings which always look brassy after you wear them a little while. They are filled with enough real gold to give them genuine wearing qualities, and being fashioned in style and design to exactly correspond with the latest styles of expensive solid gold rings not one person in a thousand will realize that you are wearing anything but the solid gold article. Please read the following descriptions then you can easily tell which one of these beautiful rings you prefer to have us send you as a gift.

BE SURE TO SEND YOUR RING SIZE!

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Free Offer! By buying a large quantity of these rings direct from the manufacturers we did not have to pay two or three middlemen's profits but secured them at the factory price and this enables us to make a great offer that none of our readers can afford to overlook. Send us only two 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents and we will send you FREE AND POSTPAID your choice of any one ring illustrated and described above. Remember our guarantee that these rings are genuine gold filled and that they will wear indefinitely and give splendid satisfaction. Do not forget to specify by number the ring or rings you want.

26-Piece Daisy Silver Set

Warranted For Five Years

Will Wear Like Solid Silver

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Six

WE have in the past made many fine premium offers of silverware to readers of COMFORT, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete silver set in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think because we are giving away this splendid set on such liberal terms that it is the ordinary cheap silverware which is plated on a brass base and consequently changes color and has that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is silver plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will never show signs of tarnish or wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept our offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six 15-months subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, you will receive this 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Large Shaggy Teddy Bear

The Best Playmate A Boy or Girl Ever Had

10 Inches High And Full Jointed

FREE FOR A CLUB OF TWO!

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" looks exactly as you see him in the picture above. He is a big shaggy fellow, nearly a foot tall, made of rich, handsome brown plush, paws lined with felt, carefully stitched and finished and his head, arms and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit up, stand on his head, go on all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "Teddy" is so well made that no matter how roughly he is handled he cannot become broken and with ordinary care should last for years. Teddy Bears like this one generally cost a good round sum in the stores, but as we have imported a large quantity of them from Germany at a special low price we can well afford to give them away on terms so liberal that there is no reason why every boy and girl should not have one of them at once. We will send you "Teddy" free if you will accept the following special

Stylish Colored Petticoat

For A Club Of Two

Kelley Green, Cerise Or Black

COLORED petticoats modeled along narrow lines to conform to the narrow dress skirts that are now the style. Kelley Green, Cerise or "American Beauty" and Black seem to be popular shades as they afford a striking contrast to most any dress. The petticoat offered here is made of handsome sateen or "farmer's satin" of good quality with finished seams and deep flounce and it comes in the popular colors above mentioned. Every woman to be in fashion now needs one or more of these petticoats which fit so nicely and hang so gracefully having not near so much fullness as the old petticoats and yet not of the extreme bobble style. Be sure to specify size and color wanted when ordering. We have them in sizes all the way from 38 to 44 and will send you exact size and the color desired, if you will accept the following.

Club Offer. For a club of only two 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one of these petticoats free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 612.

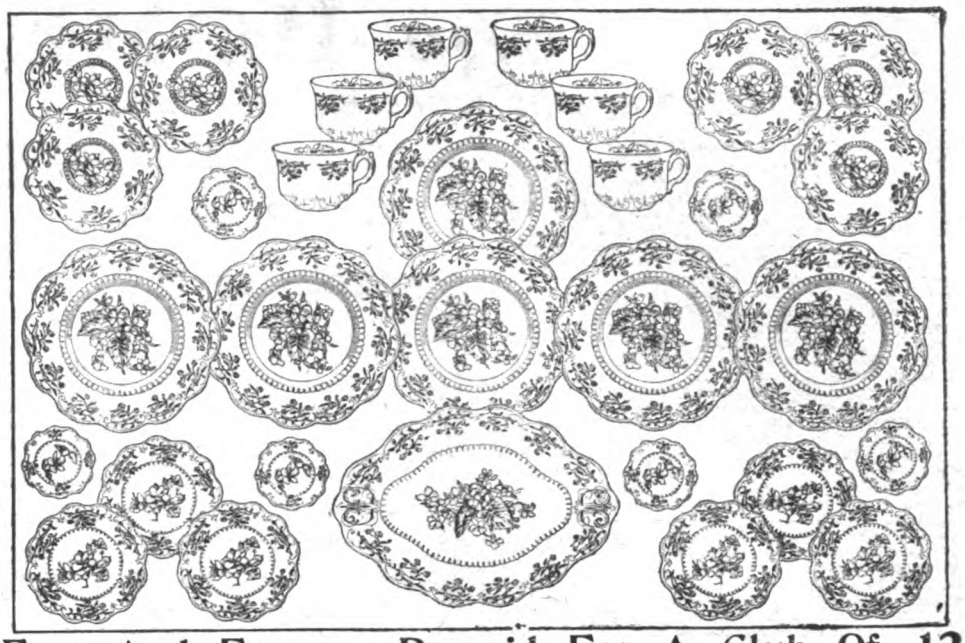
European War Stops Importation Of Dolls

No More Dolls After This Lot Is Gone !!!!

And Our Stock Is Nearly Exhausted!

Send For YOUR Doll NOW

It Is Your Last Chance To Get A Dressed Doll FREE!



Don't Put Off Getting Up Your Club. We Have Less Than Three Thousand Dolls On Hand.

WE feel that it is our duty to inform all COMFORT readers that owing to the great European conflict there is going to be a doll famine in this country within the next few weeks. No dolls have been imported into the United States since the European War began and no dolls can be imported until the war is over and no one knows when that will be. What few dolls there are in the stores in this country today will be sold for high prices that are beyond the reach of the ordinary wage earner. It is going to be a doll-less Christmas for thousands of little tots this year and realizing this fact we think it best to admit that we have on hand but a limited quantity of the big, beautiful talking and sleeping dolls which we imported from Germany before the war broke out and only those of our readers who send in their club orders at once will make sure of getting one of these dolls before our stock is completely exhausted. This is the same doll which has delighted thousands of little girls in homes where COMFORT goes—a handsome, fully dressed, life size, talking and sleeping doll, nearly a foot and a half tall with a beautiful picture hat of latest style, handsome lace-and-ribbon trimmed gown and complete wardrobe of pretty lace-trimmed underwear, elegant openwork stockings and dainty low shoes with bright, shiny buckles. She says "Papa" and "Mamma" just as plain as can be, closes her blue eyes and goes to sleep when you lay her down and is wide awake again the minute you pick her up. Her cheeks are like red rosies, her beautiful golden hair hangs in long clustering curls and she shows her pearly white teeth in one of the prettiest smiles you ever saw. She can be dressed and undressed as often as you wish and is so well made with fine bisque head and strong body that she cannot possibly become broken if you take good care of her. Remember we have only a limited quantity of these dolls on hand—less than three thousand in fact—and that while they last it is going to be a case of first come, first served. If you put this off you may have to buy a doll and pay a war price for it; indeed, the stock in the stores may be completely sold out before you get around to it, so to be on the safe side you had better send in your club right away. Following is our free offer Read it and start getting up your club today.

Club Offer. For a club of only six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you free by Parcel Post prepaid this beautiful fully dressed, talking and sleeping doll, carefully packed in a strong box so that she positively will not get broken. Premium No. 621.

31-Piece Princess Violet Dinner Set

Free And Express Prepaid For A Club Of 12

THIS splendid set of dishes is full size for family use and consists of 6 Plates, 6 Cups, 6 Saucers, 6 Cerial or Fruit Dishes, 6 Individual Butters and large Meat Platter all handsomely decorated with clusters of purple wood violets surrounded with rich green foliage and bordered with lovely tracings of gold. Unlike the ordinary dishes that are usually offered as premiums, every piece in this magnificent set is (with the exception of the decorations) snowy white in color, dainty in design, light in weight and finish with a Haviland glaze which gives it that smooth, velvety appearance so much admired by every woman. The decorations will last a lifetime because being burned into the ware and underneath the glaze it positively will not wash, rub or wear off. Our illustration does not give you any idea of the real beauty of these dishes because it fails to show up the pleasing color combination of purple, green and gold which is so finely set off by the flawless white of the ware itself This is by far the handsomest, daintiest dinner set we have ever offered to COMFORT readers and we are positive that it will more than please every woman who secures one of them on the terms of our very liberal offer. No matter where you live, we will ship you this set direct from the pottery in Ohio by express, all charges prepaid and guaranteed against breakage. If you find any piece or pieces cracked or broken when you receive your set, we will send you free and prepaid new pieces in their place so you may feel sure of owning the set complete and best of all without a cent of expense.

OUR FREE OFFER For a club of only twelve 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome 31-Piece Violet Decorated Dinner Set carefully packed to prevent breakage, by express all charges prepaid. Premium No. 461.

A Nice Warm Sweater

For MEN, BOYS and small Children

Is The Best Preventive of Colds and Pneumonia!

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," so goes the old saying and this handsome, warm, close-fitting sweater will save doctor's bills for any man, boy or child by warding off those miserable winter colds which so often lead to deadly pneumonia and consumption. It is the best of all fall and winter garments for little children to play in out-of-doors and for boys and girls going to school on cold fall and winter days, or when sliding or skating or engaging in other outdoor winter sports. For men or boys either who are compelled to travel or to work midst sleet, snow and ice, a good warm sweater is nothing short of an absolute necessity. The sweater offered here is just as warm and comfortable as it looks, a perfect-fitting garment closely woven of the best material and beautifully finished and it buttons down the front like a coat so it is very easy to get in or out of. This sweater may be washed as often as desired in the ordinary way and it positively will not shrink or change color. You can have your choice of colors of either brown, blue, cardinal or grey and the sizes run from 24 to 30 for children, 32 to 36 for young boys and girls and 38 to 44 for men and young men. Be sure to send chest measurement when ordering and we will guarantee to send you the exact size desired. Also do not forget to mention color wanted.

Club Offer No. 1. For a club of six 15-month subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you a man's or boy's size sweater free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 649.

Cast on 20 sts. toward the front, giving 45 sts. on needle, k. 80 ridges and bind off. Knit the other front in the same way.

Border Around Sweater

Knit border in color on fronts and back then sew up under arms.

With color on the right side one front pick up 45 sts., turn. P. 3, k. 3, repeat to end.

Make 12 more rows in this way and bind off. Finish other front in same way.

ERMINE TOPPED SLIPPERS.

On back pick up 140 stitches and border, same number of rows.

Collar

With white wool pick up 72 sts. around neck, and knit 4 ridges.

Purl 1 row.—Knit 2 ridges. Break off wool and with color k. 8 ridges, with white 2 ridges and bind off.

Sleeve

With white wool, cast on 60 sts. Knit 45 ridges. Knit 8 ridges, decreasing 1 every other row until there are 52 sts. on needle.

Form wristbands by knitting 1, purling 1 for 25 rows and bind off.

Finish the fronts by staying with ribbon or satin, cutting and working buttonholes and sewing on buttons.

Before cutting the buttonholes, stitch back and forth several times on machine between two ridges, then there will be no raveling.

Baby's Crocheted Sacque

For Mrs. Olive Hurd and Others

This has square slipper stitch yoke of color with white skirt part and sleeves. About two and one half skeins white and one skein color, fine bone hook No. 2 and steel hook No. 5 will be needed. With colored wool and steel hook, ch. 81 sts.

1st row.—Make 80 s. c., 1 into each chain. Turn, ch. 1.

3rd row.—19 s. c. 3 s. c., in next st., to widen, 6. s. c., 3 s. c. in next st. to widen: 26 s. c. 3 s. c. in next st. 6. s. c. 3 s. c., in next st. 1, 9 s. c. Turn, ch. 1.

4th row.—20 s. c. 3 s. c. in next st., 8. s. c. 3 s. c. in next st., 28 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st. 8 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st. 20 s. c. Turn, ch. 1.

Continue widening at the four widening points, as indicated, until there are 20 rows, or 10 ridges.

Make a row of holes along the fronts and neck of yoke as follows: Ch. 5, 1 d. c. in first ridge of yoke; * ch. 2, 1 d. c. in next ridge repeat from * until the corner of yoke is reached, where 3 d. c. are made in 1 st., with ch. 2, between each; * ch. 2, skip 2 sts. and make 1 d. c.; repeat from * until the other corner is reached, and then complete the other front. Break off wool. The skirt of the sacque is made in shells of 4 d. c. with white and bone hook.

1st row.—Shell of 4 d. c. around chain of hole; * skip 1 s. c. in next s. c. Repeat from * 6 times more; * skip 2 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * 6 times more; skip 1 s. c., 1 shell in next s. c. or corner of yoke; * skip 2 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * 5 times more; * skip 1 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * twice; * skip 2 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * 5 times more; skip 1 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c., or corner of yoke; * skip 2 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * twice; * skip 1 s. c. 1 shell in next s. c. Repeat from * 10 times more. You have now reached the center of the back. Reverse the other half to correspond, ending with a shell around chain of hole. Turn.

2nd row.—1 s. c. in center of shell of preceding row, ch. 3 and 3 d. c. in same shell. Continue making shells of 4 d. c. in the center of shells of preceding row. Turn.

3rd row.—1 s. c. in center of shell of preceding row, ch. 3 and make 3 d. c. in same shell. Continue making shell on shell until there are 16 shells in all across front. Break wool. Skip 15 shells for sleeve; commence with a new thread and make shell on shell for 29 shells across back. Break wool; skip 15 shells for sleeve; commence with a new thread and make shell on shell for 16 shells across front. Turn.

4th row.—Shell on shell for 16 shells across front; skip 15 shells for sleeve; shell on shell for 29 shells across back; skip 15 shells for sleeve; make shell on shell for 16 shells across the other front. Continue thus for 20 rows more. Break wool.

Sleeve.—Shell on shell, having 19 shells around sleeve; for 14 rows more, or 16 rows, counting from shoulder. Break wool. For cuff with color make 1 s. c. in center of shell; ch. 11. Turn; 1 s. c. in each of the ch. 10 and fasten in center of next shell. Turn; * 1 s. c., in each of the 10 s. c., picking up the back part of chain to form a rib. Turn; ch. 1, 1 s, c. in each of the 10 s. c., picking up the back part of ch. to form a rib; fasten in center of next shell. Turn. Repeat from * around cuff and join with slip stitches. Around bottom of cuff make 1 d. c. in each rib, with ch. 2 between each.

2nd row.—Fasten with 1 s. c. in space between the 2 d. c.; * make a shell of 5 d. c. in next space; fasten with 1 s. c. in next space. Repeat from * around cuff. Finish with a picot edge.

Around neck, fronts and bottom of sacque with color make shells the same as on sleeves.

Draw ribbon through holes at neck and cuffs.

Ermine Topped Slippers

Materials: 4 skeins blue Germantown, 2 skeins white and 1 black, medium bone hook, 1 pair steel knitting needles No. 14.

Begin with ch. 16 sts. of blue, turn, 1 s. c. in 2nd st. and 1 s. c. in each next 5 sts. 2 s. c. in each next 3 sts., 6 s. c. in next 6 sts. ch. 1, turn.

2nd row.—6 s. c. taking only the back loop to form rib. 1 s. c. in each next 6 sts., putting hook through both loops, 6 s. c. same as first 6 to form rib. Ch. 1, turn.

3rd row.—1 s. c. in 8 sts., forming rib, 2 s. c. in next 3 sts., 7 s. c., forming rib, ch. 1, turn.

4th row.—Same as 2nd row, only the rib will be longer.

5th row—Same as 3rd row. Continue thus, putting 2 sts. in 3 center sts. in every other row, and only forming ribs on the sides.

Make 18 rows thus, ribbed on the sides to complete vamp.

Then work back and forth on 17 sts., making 36 rows or 18 ribs and join to the other side.

For the ermine top, with white wool cast on 18 sts. and make a strip in plain knitting long enough to reach around the back of the slipper.

Bind off and overcast, leaving it open in front.

Finish the edge of turn over with a row of s. c., working picot of ch. 3 in every third st.

The ermine like effect is secured by working black sts. on the white at regular intervals.

Finish with a cord made of twisted black and white wool.

To keep the slipper close run an elastic in at base of turn over and sew together in the front, then finish with ribbon bows.

Wheel Centerpiece

In Fig 1. is illustrated one of the large wheels which are grouped about the smaller center one to form this centerpiece.

Crumbs of Comfort

Repentance always costs dear.

Good courage breaks ill luck to pieces.

Much good never came with little effort.

There is no tomorrow for an asking friend.

Never trust a man whom you have injured.

Take your wife's first advice, not her second.

Thinking is very far from knowing the truth.

A pound of worry will not pay an ounce of debt.

He who resolves to do better has God on his side.

We may give advice, but we cannot give conduct.

One who has no ill fortune is tired out with good.

A wise man never says: "I did not think of that."

What maintains one vice would bring up two children.

You learn the value of water when the well goes dry.

Add frugality to industry and the sum is competence.

Many have been ruined by buying too many good bargains.

Prayers and provender never hindered any man's journey.

Govern yourself by reason; though some like it, others do not.

If you will not listen to reason she will surely rap your knuckles.

Enjoy what little you have while the foolish are looking for more.

If you would always have money, keep it when you do have it.

Who is not more nor better than another deserves no more than another.

Make the night night and the day day and you will be healthy and wise.

Tell not what you know, judge not what you see and you shall live in quiet.

It is easier to suppress the desire for anything than to satisfy all that follow.

The Lord keep us from those we trust; from those we do not trust we may keep ourselves.

THE FOX'S SKIN

Wiles of an Old Match-Maker

By Lee Coleman

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

JOHN Fox was famed for getting his own way by hook or by crook. A good many people said he preferred to get it by crook. At any rate, he was known to hold in high respect Richelieu's motto: "When the lion's skin will not reach, eke it out with the fox's." John Fox had acted on the motto with such good effect that when he was sixty years old he was reputed to have thirty million dollars. He also had a recalcitrant nephew, who hoped to be an artist.

The nephew was John Rutherford—the John Rutherford whose initials now appear on the corners of so many magazine covers and posters and of whose prices less fortunate craftsmen speak with awe. At the time when he defied his uncle, however, he was unknown except in the chronicles of the gilded rich.

There was nothing new about his defiance. A more hackneyed cause of quarrel could scarcely be imagined. Uncle had an accident while in a distant Southern city; a pretty girl nursed him back to health and refused to take any pay; uncle decided that nephew should pay the debt by going South, meeting the pretty girl, and marrying her; nephew said he'd be —derned if he would; uncle observed that nephew was an ungrateful young puppy and that he'd make him marry the girl yet and that meanwhile he could get out and see how he liked fending for himself.

John Rutherford took the casting out as well as could be expected. He went to his studio and buckled down to what his club friends termed a life of unremitting toil. That is to say he came to the studio at nine o'clock every morning and worked till three o'clock every afternoon, when he left for the day.

He had been doing this for six months when, one afternoon, he received a couple of visitors who stayed long and talked earnestly. When they left John Rutherford did a war dance on the polished floor. Then he glanced at the clock, saw that it was nearly three o'clock—his usual hour for disappearing and hastily began to get ready to go out.

Suddenly he stopped. "Good Lord!" he cried. "What a fool I am. I don't have to go now. I can—Good Lord! I can marry Helen now—if she'll have me. By George! I'll ask her right away."

Waiting for nothing, not even to look in the mirror and make sure that his tie was straight, he shot out of the room and crossed the corridor to a door marked "Helen Heath."

He had known Miss Heath only since she had come to the building three months before, but he felt that he knew her very well indeed. Eagerly he tapped at the door.

No answer came, but the unlatched door swung open. For an instant he hesitated, then he pushed it wide, "May I come in?" he called.

The room was untenanted, but a shadow crossed the amber glass of the door to the other room, showing that someone was within, and Rutherford clutched at the knocker and clamored a peremptory rat-tat-tat.

Almost instantly the other door opened and Miss Heath came out. But she was not the Miss Heath he had known. She was dressed differently, for one thing. He had always pictured her as a being who wore a beautiful pale-green gown trimmed with soft laces and sat upon a couch among piled cushions with her exquisite face and curly nut-brown hair nimbussed against a stained glass window, and who served him tea with delicate pointed fingers. He had seen her this way the first time he had called (after the meeting in the hall) and he had always carried her thus in his mind, having never seen her in any very different pose or costume.

On this occasion, however, she was different—so different that his mental picture was instantly and irrevocably shattered. Instead of a filmy gown she wore a shirt-waist and a very tight walking skirt. She was neat and bright and fresh looking as a cherry or a new pin, but she was not the Helen Heath that he had known. Moreover, her hair——

Miss Heath herself seemed startled and not altogether pleased. She stared at Rutherford in fascinated wonder. "Mr. Rutherford!" she breathed, almost as if she asked a question. "I—I thought you had gone long ago?"

Rutherford shook his head. He had drawn down his brows, as if in perplexity, like one trying to identify an elusive likeness.

"I've broken my rule," he said, slowly. "Or rather, I've changed it, for always, I hope. The fact is I've had good news and—won't you give me a cup of tea and let me tell it to you."

Miss Heath flushed slowly. She was growing more agitated.

"Oh! I'm so sorry!" she gasped. "Glad that you have good news, of course, but sorry that I can't possibly wait to hear it now. I—I have an engagement that I must keep. I was just going out and—and——"

Rutherford laughed, boyishly and delightedly. "Sit down, Miss Heath," he begged, in quite another tone. "Break your engagement, please. I simply must talk to you now, at once."

The girl's eyes met Rutherford's. For an instant she sustained his gaze bravely; then she turned and made her way blindly to the tea-table. Her hands trembled on the cups as she shifted them. She did not look at Rutherford. This was unfortunate, for the expression in Rutherford's eyes could not be mistaken.

Quietly he seated himself across the tiny table. "I beg your pardon, Miss Heath," he said, gently. "I have no right to insist. But my need is urgent. May I tell you my good news?"

"Yes!" The girl did not look up. Her voice was almost inaudible.

"The publisher of the Columbian Magazine came to see me an hour or two ago. He has bought four cover designs from me at five hundred dollars each."

As if moved by a spring the girl straightened up. "Is that your news?" she cried. "Accept my congratulations. The money will serve you very nicely for carfare. Now, if you will excuse me ——" She rose.

Rutherford did not move. "That is part of my news," he said composedly. "But you are wrong. The money will not serve for carfare. It will pay for bread and butter. I have not eaten since

"GENERAL MARION"

What do you know about General Francis Marion, the bold night rider and dreaded raider? Brave as a lion and cunning as a fox, this hero of half a hundred battles and skirmishes, with his band of southern patriots, was a scourge to the British invaders in South Carolina and a terror to their Tory allies. The British called him the "Swamp Fox" because he was too quick and too smart for them.

How many outside of South Carolina, his native State, know of the distinguished services he rendered in the Revolutionary War?

Read the illustrated story of the brilliant exploits and thrilling adventures of this remarkable man in February COMFORT. It is a true story, interesting, instructive and inspiring.

"The Miracle of Love"

A charming story of true love and devotion that will do anybody good to read. The author presents a high ideal of what love really means to a woman and the sacrifice she will make for love's sake.

"Redeemed by a Valentine" is another very pretty love story appropriate to the season. Both these fine stories will appear complete in

Monthly Lesson in History

By C. B. Irvine

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT was Numa, the second king of Rome twenty-six centuries ago, who decreed that the year should begin with this month, and in order that the calendar might conform with his ideas he added two new months to the ten into which the year had previously been divided. The first of these he called January, in honor of Janus, the two-faced deity supposed to preside over doors—one looking back over the old year and the other peering into the new. Janus was also the god of war, the gates of his temple in Rome being closed in times of peace and open only during war. It was not until 1752 that January was recognized as the first month of the legal year in England. The poet Shelley expressed the sentiment of practically all of the bards when he said "January gray is here," for whenever the month is mentioned in verse—which is infrequent—the reference is to "the blasts of January" or something bearing upon the fury of the wind or the biting cold. The gem stone of January is the garnet, which is said to insure power, grace and victory. The flower symbolic of the month is the snowdrop, attesting friendship in trouble, consolation and hope.

Among all nations and in all ages the first day of the new year has been and is regarded as a holiday, a day of rejoicing and worship. In all but six states of the Union it is a legal holiday.

Some of the principal events of the world taking place during this month during the years have been as follows:

1st—Edmund Burke, born, 1730. The union of Ireland and Great Britain accomplished, 1801.

2nd—Gen. James Wolfe, hero of Quebec, born 1727. The Battle of Granada, 1492, which completed the overthrow of Moorish power in Spain.

3rd—Cicero, born 107 B. C.

4th—Jacob Grimm, writer of fairy tales, born 1785.

5th—Edward the Confessor, died 1066. Battle of Nancy, 1477, in which Charles the Bold was slain.

6th—Known as the twelfth day, as being in that number after Christmas and the last of the Christmas holidays, sometimes called "Little Christmas." Richard II, King of England, born 1366. Joan d'Arc, born 1402.

7th—St. Distaff's day—or Rock day—the first free day after the twelve holidays by which Christmas was formerly celebrated. President Millard Fillmore, born 1800.

8th—Battle of New Orleans, 1815. Owing to the slowness of communication, Gen. Jackson fought this battle after peace had been made. Legal holiday in Louisiana, known as Jackson's, or "Old Hickory's" birthday. Galileo, who invented and first used a telescope, born 1642.

9th—Caroline Herschel, astronomer, died 1848, aged 97.

10th—Penny postage first exemplified in England; designed by Rowland Hill. Linnæus, famous naturalist, died 1778.

11th—First lottery in England held drawing 1569.

12th—Emperor Maximilian I, died 1519.

13th—George Fox, founder of the Quaker sect, died 1690.

14th—15th—Battle of Rivoli, 1797. Napoleon's victory was followed by the surrender of Mantua and the complete conquest of Lombardy.

16th—Richard Savage, poet, died 1697. Edmund Spenser, poet, died 1599. Edward Gibbon, historian, died 1809. Battle of Corunna, in which Sir John Moore was killed.

17th—Benjamin Franklin, born 1706. President Rutherford B. Hayes, died 1893.

18th—Sarah of Exeter, the peasant Countess, died 1797. Daniel Webster, born 1782. President John Tyler, died 1862.

19th—Tragedy of Khartoum in the Nile campaign, 1885. James Watt, of steam engine fame, born 1736. Isaac Disraeli, writer, died 1848.

20th—David Garrick, celebrated actor, died 1779. Gen. Gordon slain at Khartoum.

21st—Henry VII King of England, born 1456. Louis XVI of France, died. Stonewall Jackson, born 1824. Queen Victoria, died 1901. James G. Blaine, born 1830; died Jan. 27, 1893. John C. Fremont, born 1813.

22nd—Lord Byron, born 1788. Francis Bacon, born 1561. "South Sea Bubble" inaugurated, 1720.

23rd—William Pitt, statesman, died 1806.

24th—Frederick the Great of Prussia, born 1712.

25th—Robert Burns, born 1759.

26th—Napoleon Vice-president of the Italian Republic.

27th—Mozart, born 1756. John J. Audubon, naturalist, died 1851.

28th—Emperor Charlemagne, died 814. King Henry VIII, died 1547. Sir Francis Drake, died 1596—Peter the Great, Czar of Russia, died 1725. W. H. Prescott, historian, died 1859. In 1770 began the administration of Lord North, during which the American colonies were lost to the British crown. First street of any city lighted by gas (Pall Mall, London) 1807.

29th—Napoleon in Battle of Brienne. Thomas Paine, political writer, born 1737. George III, died 1820. Emmanuel Swedenborg, born 1688, President Wm. McKinley, born 1843.

30th—King Charles I, died 1649, beheaded on the scaffold.

31st—Ben Jonson, born 1574. Charles Edward Stuart, the last person of the Stuart family to attempt to recover the forfeited crown of England, died 1788.

Are We in Danger of Being Attacked by Foreign Enemies?

NOW that certain warring nations are fighting not only for a place in the sun, but to achieve world-wide domination, it behooves us to have a radical stock taking, and note what our position is in comparison with the other peoples who occupy a place on this revolving sphere where we make our home.

The time is not far distant when all the desirable land surface on this globe will be occupied, and one of the greatest underlying causes of the conflagration in Europe, is due to the fact that Germany's rapidly increasing population wants more elbow-room, and for that matter so do all European nations with the possible exception of France and Russia. This elbow-room and the opportunities that go with it, the Teuton emigrants must seek, if not in German colonies, then in the colonies of other nations, where they inevitably cease to be an asset to the parent land.

To get a better understanding of this matter and the serious conditions that will eventually arise (unless the nations, as in the case of France, so arrange that their population shall not be in excess of the land's ability to support its citizens) we must bear in mind that of the 52,641,102 square miles of land on this planet only 30,000,000 are capable of supporting human life; in fact two of our most eminent scientists set the earth's productive area at two million square miles less than we have computed it.

It is an astonishing fact that Great Britain and her colonies, comprising 12,000,000 square miles, and the United States and their outlying possessions covering 4,000,000 square miles, together control more than half the fertile area of the globe As to population: the British Empire contains 435,000,000 people of whom 45,216,741 reside in the British Isles, while the United States and their dependencies have a population of about 115,000,000. And as the total population of the world is estimated at 1,600,000,000 it appears that these two English speaking nations, which possess more than half the inhabitable land, also control 600,000,000 people, or more than one third of the earth's inhabitants.

Is the world overpopulated? In spots, yes, but on the whole, no. There are at present on an average only thirty souls to the square mile, and a square mile at a pinch will take care of a hundred people. The earth figured on this basis, is capable of supporting about 3,000,000,000 humans, not comfortably but crowded and pinched, struggling for the bare necessaries of life.

It does not take an expert mathematician long to bring us face to face with the painful fact that in a few generations the earth will have the full total that it is estimated it will be capable of supporting.

The earth's inhabitants are not evenly distributed. There are some vast areas that are still sparsely settled and other extensive regions where the population is large and crowded, and it is in these congested countries that trouble arises, for the cup that is full, if we still continue to pour liquid into it, must inevitably overflow. In some sections of the globe (China for instance) the population has become so dense that millions of people have been pushed right off the face of the earth and have been living on rafts, junks and other vessels on the rivers and harbors of the Celestial Kingdom.

In Canton no less than three hundred thousand Chinese, men, women and children, live permanently on the water. In Europe the industrious Hollanders have pushed the ocean back from off their land and are now living on the reclaimed bottom of the North Sea These industrious people have to keep their country, which cannot be drained because lower than the sea, continually pumped out by means of numberless windmills. Japan, India and in fact the most of Asia as well as Europe are overpopulated.

Now the question naturally arises, with the earth's population constantly increasing, how long can we of English speaking race, keep this North American continent of ours, so favored by nature from being engulfed by a mighty human flood, that even now is threatening to sweep o'er the oceans and overwhelm us.

We have felt the pressure of the Japanese and other Orientals in the West already, and that pressure is going to increase as the years roll on. India too has been spewing the advance guards of its dusky hordes on the western borders of Canada. A Canadian official who was active in keeping out a heavy shipload of Hindoos has been assassinated by an Oriental.

In all our coast cities are secret societies of Asiatics whose object is to war on the white man and appropriate his territority.

Not only is the world casting longing eyes at these shores of ours, still more with eager eyes does it drink in the vast continent to the south of us.

We throw the mantle of our protection in the shape of the Monroe Doctrine from Alaska and Labrador to Cape Horn, telling the old-World powers that they shall not extend their system of conquest and colonization to North and South America. But how does the world view that Monroe Doctrine of ours? The Kaiser regards it as "a piece of impertinence," and so do most of the other European governments. We have Germany's official declaration, backed by her action at the outbreak of the present war, that treaties are but "scraps of paper" to be contemptuously broken when performance of their obligations becomes irksome. Would other nations have any higher regard for treaty rights? The Monroe Doctrine is not based on any treaty. It is merely a policy of the United States respected so far as we have the military power to enforce it. Civilization, alas! has not yet carried us from the bloody era of might to the peaceful age of reason and right. The sword, alas! is still the only arbiter of the destinies of nations. Only those who are ready and prepared with big guns and battleships to defend their rights and territory are safe from attack and conquest.

With Europe and Asia casting jealous eyes on our broad and productive acres, our riches, our vast natural resources and sparsely settled areas, and with land hunger gnawing at the heart of great and warlike nations, it behooves us, if we wish to retain the heritage our fathers have bequeathed to us, to arm, or otherwise we are liable to see our fair cities share the fate of Louvain, or lie prostrate beneath the heel of the conqueror as in the case of Belgium.

It is preposterous to talk of these "enlightened days," when the only light that is recognized in the council chambers of the nations is that which flashes from the uplifted sabre, the charging bayonet or the bomb bursting in air. To be unprepared is to invite attack, to be half prepared is to court defeat. Only by being thoroughly and efficiently armed on land and sea can we keep our shores inviolate and be allowed to work out our destinies without challenge or interference from foes, white, yellow or black.

The Grant Doctrine

THE celebrated Monroe Doctrine, so named because formulated and first promulgated by President Monroe some eighty years ago as a policy which the United States would enforce, by war if necessary, warned Europe not to attempt the subjugation of any of the free republics in North, South and Central America or in any way interfere with their independence.

Accordingly, in 1865, our government compelled Louis Napoleon to withdraw the French troops that had made the Austrian Prince Maximilian Emperor of Mexico, and were supporting his tottering throne which fell as soon as his foreign soldiers departed.

Shortly after this, when a certain European power proposed to sell some of its West Indian colonies to another European government, President Grant forbade the sale, proclaiming to the world that the United States would not permit the transfer of any American colony from one European government to another. This is the Grant Doctrine which has become the settled policy of the United States and goes a step further than the Monroe Doctrine.

There has been some discussion started by the indiscrete inquiry of the German ambassador as to what would be the attitude of our government in case German troops should invade and subjugate Canada as an incident to the present war. Our government has respectfully declined to answer at the present juncture on the ground that there appears to be no immediate prospect of Germany being able to get troops over to Canada.

One phase of the question is easily answered, while it has other aspects that present embarrassing complications.

The Grant Doctrine would not permit Germany to annex Canada or to hold it under any conditions after the close of the war. And this supposed case of Canada, which might actually come to pass, is an excellent illustration of the wisdom of the Grant Doctrine and its vital importance as affecting the welfare of the United States.

Canada is a good neighbor with whom we, as a people, have been on friendly terms for an even hundred years and expect to continue so for centuries to come regardless of whether she should prefer to remain under the British flag or at some future time see fit to become an independent republic, which status she nearly approximates at present. But if any change in our neighbors should be attempted through the interposition of an old world power, the United States would have something to say as to who the new neighbors shall be. And what Uncle Sam says in such case will go as it did with Emperor Louis Napoleon and the French soldiers he sent to Mexico.

Another phase of the question is so fraught with difficulties that it is not easy to predict what action the United States would take in case Germany should attack Canada in the present war strictly for the purpose of military results and not for permanent occupation or change of sovereignty.

In principle and as a matter of abstract right Germany would be justified in attacking Canada as a part of the British Empire and because Canadian troops are fighting the Germans in France and Belgium; and under the present circumstances such action would not conflict with the Monroe or the Grant Doctrine, if not intended to result in change of sovereignty or occupation after the end of the war.

But fortunately for Germany, if she values the good will of the American people, the naval situation renders it impossible for her to send troops across the Atlantic. We have already suffered great inconvenience and financial loss in consequence of the great European conflict with which we have no concern, and we are contributing millions of dollars to feed and clothe the seven million destitute and starving Belgians who are homeless and starving because the German armies have devastated their country, destroyed their homes, consumed their crops, confiscated their horses and cattle and taken their money by exacting payment of enormous fines, taxes and indemnities.

Our people shudder at the thought of a possible German invasion of Canada and a repetition among our neighbors of the horrors inflicted on the Belgians. As against the sympathies of our people wrought to the highest pitch by the sight of Canadian cities laid in ashes and homeless, starving refugees from across the border seeking asylum and food among us, reason and argument would avail but little to deter our citizens from throwing over their neutrality. Excited public sentiment often forces the hands of government, and it is to be feared a German invasion of Canada might draw the United States into the war.

President Wilson acted wisely in refusing to state in advance what would be the attitude of our government in case of a German invasion of Canada, for none can predict it with certainty. But by the decided tone of the editorial comment which his question drew from the newspapers and magazines the German Ambassador may gather a shrewd inkling of how the American people regard his proposition.

The Panama Canal Affecting Railroad Freight Rates

IN answer to our editorial, last summer, urging that American coastwise shipping be exempted from payment of Panama Canal tolls as a means of forcing the railroads to lower their trans-continental freight rates, some of our readers wrote us asserting that the competition of commerce passing through the canal would have no effect on railroad freight rates because the latter are regulated by the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

The fallacy of their argument is proven thus early because a month ago the western railroads petitioned the Inter-State Commerce Commission for permission to lower their trans-continental freight rates to meet the competition of shipments by way of the Panama Canal.

As we predicted, the railroads must meet this competition by reducing their freight rates, and if American ships had been exempted from canal tolls the freight rates by way of the canal and by rail would be cut just that much lower.

Perhaps some of those politicians who are wondering what hit them at the recent November election, may see new light and come to the conclusion that the action of Congress on the canal tolls question had something to do with it. Let us hope so.

The Much Loved Queen of the Belgians

BY C. L. CHAPMAN.

It is a sudden blasting of hopes which has brought sorrow to the young and affectionate Queen Elizabeth. Since the death of the profligate King Leopold II, King Albert I and his wife, who was Princess Elizabeth of Bavaria, have fought great difficulties, met many handicaps, and emerged triumphantly.

First of all, they had to live down the reputation of the licentious Leopold, Albert's uncle. The people no longer respected, they even hated that aged monarch; and there was dissension when Albert ascended the throne, anarchy was evident everywhere.

But King Albert has proven to his people that he is the direct opposite of his uncle; he has encouraged the commercial, literary and artistic prestige of his country, is a devoted husband and affectionate father, averse to pomp and display, affable and free in manner, profoundly interested in social and economic questions, and as is his wife, an artist of no mean ability.

Queen Elizabeth has been the inspiration of her husband in every reform in that tiny kingdom, which has seen only three rulers, yet has become so powerful financially and commercially.

But sorrow has suddenly been heaped upon the lovable and lovely queen of Belgium. She has been acknowledged to be one of the most beautiful and intellectual queens in all Europe.

When the Princess Elizabeth assumed the duties of housewife in the royal palace in Brussels she found it denuded of its statuary, rare paintings, tapestries, bric-a-brac, silver plate, expensive furniture, and ornaments of all kinds. It was like entering a beautiful home from which poverty had taken the furnishings. It was the result of the late King Leopold's determination to circumvent his daughters' ambitions and leave them practically poverty stricken.

What with the disposal of the beautiful furnishings of the royal palace, the consequent scandal brought about through the suit of the daughters to share in the immense fortune of their dead father, the shameful stories circulated by the late king, the Congo expose, and the demoralized condition of state affairs, the young king and queen entered upon a tremendous task when they assumed the rulership of Belgium and undertook to make their reign happy and successful.

But they have had the love of their people from the first and they have devoted themselves conscientiously to the welfare of their country, until in the midst of their triumphs, their work has been halted.

The king has gone to the front, assuming command of the army, and the queen with heroic self-sacrifice has left her children in the care of guardians and governesses, and enrolled as a Red Cross nurse.

In the midst of the realization of her highest hopes, the order came for the peaceful evacuation of Brussels. In a few hours the national offices were transferred to the ancient and heavily fortified town of Antwerp, and the queen and her children fled from their palace in Brussels and took refuge in an unaccustomed home.

Queen Elizabeth has felt the inexpressible sorrow attendant upon a catastrophe which had placed Brussels, Liege and Namur in the hands of the enemy, with Malines, Louvain, and Aerschot destroyed, and the whole territory given over to plunder. She can only rely upon the caprices of fate, which may elect that the Belgian kingdom no longer shall exist, the royal rank of its sovereigns be nullified, the king and queen and the heir apparent be thrown into the world as untitled persons, who needs must toil for a living.

Their men have been mustered into service in a conflict in which the Belgians have no interest, and the fate of the nation hangs in the balance; the country is overwhelmed by the agony and anguish of martyred Belgians.

On the doubtful outcome of this conflict, in which the powers of Europe are engaged, hangs the fate of these now unhappy people.

Some Strange Facts About Radium

There are three astonishing facts about radioactive substances. First, they cause certain substances placed near them to fluoresce, or glow. For instance, a diamond, if placed near a minute quantity of radium, will shine in the dark. Second, they make the surrounding air a conductor of electricity. This has been splendidly illustrated by making an electric bell ring just by the approach of a bit of radium. Third, the ceaseless sending out of light and heat, as illustrated by the spinthariscope. In other words, a particle of the gray salt of radium bromide is somewhat like a miniature sun surrounding itself by a highly active atmosphere (radium "emanations") and pouring out vast amounts of light and heart without any apparent diminution in quantity or quality.

According to the knowledge of our best scientists today, twenty-five years ago, there was no possibility of something being made out of nothing, and today, through we cannot do it ourselves, we apparently see this very thing being done in nature. Here is a piece of radium ceaselessly sending out particles at the rate of twenty-four thousand million per gram a second, traveling at the rate of twelve thousand miles a second. Two ingenious methods have led to the same result in actually counting these particles, and though it sounds too much like a fairy tale for the incredulous to believe, there is no fact in science today more thoroughly demonstrated. The life of radium is approximately two thousand four hundred and sixty years. For instance, if you had a timepiece or piece of machinery driven by radioactive properties it would run just two thousand, four hundred and sixty years without the supply being replenished.

Municipal Moving Picture Theater

Because the inhabitants of Maplewood, N. J. complained of their household help not wanting to stay because of lack of amusement, the town authorities erected a moving picture theater and are operating it to advantage.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or, donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

The Old Year and the New

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

"Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

"Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
And sweeter manners, purer laws.

"Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

"Ring in the valiant and the free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be."

—Tennyson.

WORDS cannot express more of the true meaning of the New Year than Tennyson has so beautifully portrayed in the above poem. While it may seem a time for sorrow o'er the disappointments of the past, there is always the thought to console us that another year, with its wonderful promises, is in store for us, and that even if our cherished plans are defeated now it may be but a step toward the realization later of something better and more lasting in the eyes of our Heavenly Father, to whom we should commend ourselves not only this New Year's Day but all days.—Ed.

342 W. 25th St., ERIE, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I never find any time to write but Mrs. Fridell's letter makes me steal a little time. I live in a city and do not see much more of this world's excitement than she does as I am not very strong and have five little ones under nine years to care for.

I was once a teacher and still love teaching above anything, that is why Mrs. Fridell's letter appealed to me. Though I live but three squares from school I start my little ones at home. Do not start them too young and start them right and they will go through the higher grades without any trouble. In the sixth year I begin to make their fingers nimble by card sewing, seaming, hemming, etc., in making doll clothes and fancy work. On alternate days they get drawing lessons, either on their blackboard, slate or tablet, first in making the various lines, angles, squares, etc., and later in drawing designs and pictures that are made with rule and pencil; no free hand work during the first year or two.

During the second year I begin to teach them to count, count the things I am working with, things she handles and sees, at first only up to three; that well learned, we count four, and so on, step by step. It is not necessary to go higher than twenty the first year.

For slate work I give drawing and an occasional lesson in Roman numerals (not the Arabic). With the Roman they learn principles which they could not understand by the Arabic, viz: 24 means 20 and 4, the 2 stands for 20 meaning two tens. Take the number 12, it is almost impossible to make a child see that that 1 stands for 10, before they have learned to add, but with XII they see it at once and form a good foundation for arithmetic. At first we call them clock figures and while learning these they also learn to tell time. Take one thing at a time, first 12 and 6 are meal-time, 3 to 9 are lunch-time, once around is an hour, the above figures are quarters (first teach quarters and halves by means of apples and pies), next tell her the small hand names the hours, etc., now about numbers, I, II, III, can be learned in one lesson, give the same for several days with plenty of review work. The second lesson is V, use nickels to help the memory, next teach VI, VII, VIII, one at a time, then take IV the left-handed one, he tells a new story, he says take one away from V, illustrate this with objects. Never use marks on the slate for counting as some children will count no other way once they know how. Next teach X, XI, XII, and XIII, before you give IX. Go no higher than XX. I also teach the seasons of the year and what causes it, the days of the week; months of the year, etc., but no reading until they are seven. When you begin with reading teach the written form first, use the sound as their names, and just enough words to be able to memorize the sounds. For further particulars write me when you come to reading.

I will close for this time. Will you write me occasionally as to the progress your little girl is making and do not be afraid to ask for help in any line.

MRS. D. ILLIG.

Mrs. Illig. I am sure your letter will be a vast help to Mrs. Fridell and other mothers similarly situated. There are several publications issued for the benefit of teachers that would be of great assistance in home work and I will gladly furnish the address of the publisher to anyone requesting the same, and enclosing postage.—Ed.

HARDING, S. Dak.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

This is my first attempt writing to our little corner and as I have never seen a letter from this part of South Dakota I thought I would write about our country.

We are holding down a one hundred and sixty acre homestead. We have plenty of fresh air out here which would be a great thing to people in the city where they breathe nothing but smoke and soot the year round. It is very lonely at times on the claim but people are lots more sociable out here than back East. Our neighbors are not near, so we do not see them very often, but we have a fine visit when we do meet. We are fifty miles from a railroad, but expect one to be built through this part of the country. Our mail is brought every day by the stage from the railroad. Most of the best homesteads are taken, although there are a few left.

We usually have cold winters here.

I enjoy reading the sisters' letters and receive great benefit from the many good letters. I could not keep house without dear COMFORT. I am alone a good deal of the time so I spend many an evening reading COMFORT, which I have taken for over two years. It came to my parents several years before I was married and I don't intend to let my subscription run out.

I suppose the sisters wonder what kind of houses we have on the claims. Most of them are one or two rooms; of course those with large families have larger ones. Our house is fifteen feet by twelve feet, only one room. We do not have much furniture so we have plenty of room. We have a folding bed so that is out of the way in the daytime. We expect to add to our house later on, as fast as our income increases.

Can any of the sisters send recipe for hog's-head-cheese?

I will describe myself as others do. I am twenty-three years old, five feet five inches tall, have black hair and blue-gray eyes and weigh. I do not dare to tell as I am too fleshy. I have a little girl four years old. She is the only one I have. I am very much interested in rearing children up to be noble men or noble women. MRS. DORA C. DAVIS.

Mrs. Davis. I admire the spirit you manifest in living within your income and I know of many women who would gladly exchange places with you if they could only break away from the conventions that hold them to a mortgaged house and installment-plan furniture. For the sole reason that their friends build a new house or buy a new piano, the average young couple think they must do likewise, with the usual result that by the time the house or furniture is paid for, they are more or less nervous wrecks from hard work and worry about meeting payments. Then again, you have more time to enjoy life without the added care of the useless ornaments which the average woman will persist in accumulating. We wish you success in your little home.—Ed.

Comfort's Sisters' Recipes and Everyday Helps

TOMATO BISQUE.—Blend two tablespoons of butter melted with the same quantity of flour. Thin this with a pint of hot cream or milk. Add a pint of hot, strained tomato to which a half teaspoon of soda has been stirred in.—Ed.

PEA SOUP.—Pour cold water over one cup of small peas, let come to a boil, drain, add more cold water and let boil till well cooked, stirring often. Half hour before serving add salt and pepper to taste, a pinch of ginger, one tablespoon of bacon, ham or salt pork drippings; let boil and serve.

BAKED PEARS.—Place in a stone jar a layer of pears, without paring, then a layer of sugar, then pears and so on till the jar is full. Put in as much water as it will hold and bake three hours. Slices of lemon improve the flavor.

APPLE JOHN.—Bake a pie crust rolled rather thick place on a pan half full of pared, cored and sliced apples, with one cup sugar, bits of butter and dash of cinnamon. When done, turn upside down so apples will be on top. Serve with whipped cream.

MRS. J. A. ANDERSON, Sherlock, Wash.

QUAIL ON TOAST.—Clean the quail carefully, split down the back, season with salt and pepper, and baste with melted butter while broiling over a clear fire. It requires from twelve to eighteen minutes to broil quail. Have ready your slices of buttered toast, place one on each of them and serve at once.

MRS. LILLIAN COURSEY, Click, Kans.

MEAT BALLS.—Chop leftover meat very fine; roll dried bread, add salt, pepper, cloves and mace, and one egg; mix this with the meat. Pound all together and make into balls a little larger than a hen's egg. Roll in bread crumbs and fry in hot lard. Serve with catsup.—Ed.

ROUND STEAK.—Have steak cut three quarters of an inch thick, roll in flour and pound on both sides to work the flour in. Roll in flour again and fry brown in one half butter and one half fryings. Place meat in a granite pan, slice over it one larger or two small onions, salt and pepper, add the drippings that it was fried in. Now cover all with hot water, cover tightly and cook slowly for one and one half hours. The gravy will be delicious and will not need thickening.

STEWED RABBIT.—Ingredients required: One rabbit, a few strips of bacon, rather more than one pint of good broth or stock, a bunch of savory herbs, salt and pepper to taste, thickening of butter and flour and one glass of sherry wine (not necessary). Wash the rabbit and let dry, then cut into pan and (laid) with strips of bacon and fry until brown. Put in stew pan with broth, herbs and season with salt and pepper. Simmer gently until rabbit is tender, then strain the gravy, thicken with butter and flour, add the sherry and boil a very few minutes. Place rabbit on rather deep platter and pour the gravy over it. Garnish with slices of thinly cut lemon.

CORN PUDDING.—Put the pulp of one dozen ears of corn (canned corn may be used) into a basin, add two tablespoons of flour, one tablespoon of sugar, one teaspoon of salt, pepper to taste, one well-beaten egg and one and one half cups of milk. Turn into a buttered baking dish, dot the top with butter and bake for one hour. Cabbage pudding may be made the same way but cabbage should be boiled first.

MISS ANNA HEDLAND, Elmira, R. R. 1, Mich.

RABBIT PIE.—Line a deep dish with a puff paste or rich biscuit crust; stew the rabbit, season well and pour into the dish; cover with an upper crust and bake.

RABBIT SAUSAGE.—Cut the meat from the bone of wild rabbits and slice one third bacon or fresh fat pork to the amount of rabbit meat; run through sausage grinder, add enough sage, salt and pepper to suit taste and a few onions may be added if liked. Mix well and make into small cakes and fry brown on both sides. The bacon will make grease to fry in.

MRS. DORA C. DAVIS, Harding, S. Dak.

CREAMED SHRIMPS.—Blend together one tablespoon of butter and one tablespoon of flour, then add gradually one cup of milk; season with salt and pepper and if preferred a squeeze of lemon juice. Stir constantly until it boils for a few minutes, then add one cup of chopped or picked shrimps and a cup of peas, cooked. When thoroughly heated divide into well-buttered ramekins and decorate with parsley and a ring of peas. Serve while very hot.

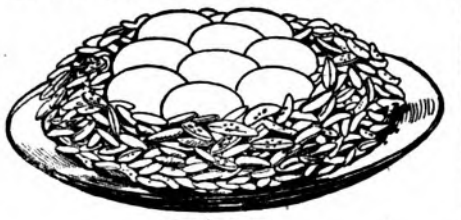
VENISON STEWED.—Cut into small steaks; make a dressing of bread crumbs, onions, butter, pepper and salt, sage and small pieces of pork, and spread upon each steak; then roll and tie; put into boiling water and stew and thicken the gravy with flour.—Ed.

SALT COD FISH.—Soak fish at least ten minutes in boiling water. For sauce, heat one pint milk, when ready to boil, stir in one egg beaten with one tablespoon corn-starch, let boil a few minutes then add piece of butter size of an egg. Let fish remain in sauce a few minutes to see if more sauce is needed.

DELICIOUS PAN STEW.—Use for cold beefsteak: Cut cold beefsteak into small pieces. Put in bottom of pan, dredge with flour, pepper and salt and one onion. Slice cold potatoes on the meat, then add a few tomatoes cut up or half a can of tomatoes. Cover with water and cook half an hour and you will have a delicious pan stew.



CREAM CABBAGE.—Beat together the yolks of two eggs, one half cup sugar, one half cup vinegar, butter size of an egg, salt and a little cayenne pepper. Put the mixture into a saucepan and stir until it boils; then stir in one cup of cream. Let it boil. Pour over the cabbage while hot.

STEWED CELERY.—Clean the heads thoroughly. Take off the coarse outer leaves. Cut in small pieces and stew in a little broth. When cooked add some cream, a little flour and butter enough to thicken the cream. Season with pepper and salt.

BOILED ONIONS.—Allow about one hour for boiling onions changing the water when half done. When tender, put in a dish and season with butter, salt and pepper. Thickened milk may be poured over them.

STUFFED CABBAGE.—Cut the heart out of a large cabbage; take cold meat of any kind, chopped fine and seasoned highly, and mix with the yolk of an egg; fill the cabbage with this, tie firmly in a cloth and boil from two to three hours.

HEN'S NEST.—Make blance mange; pour in egg-shells and set to cool; when cold break the egg-shells, place in dish, cut strips of lemon peel and boil them in a syrup of sugar and water till they are tender, and sprinkled them over and around the egg shapes and make a custard and pour over all.

CHOCOLATE PIE.—One cup sweet milk, one half cup sugar, one quarter cup butter, two tablespoons chocolate grated, one tablespoon of flour and vanilla. Put milk and sugar on to boil beat one egg well, add a little cold milk and the flour; beat to smooth paste and add to milk, stirring constantly. Add butter and chocolate melted together and boil all a few minutes, beat to smooth paste and fill cooked crusts. Frost with whipped cream or white of egg frosting.

MOCK CHERRY PIE.—One cup of cranberries, one half cup raisins, seeded and chopped with cranberries, one cup sugar, one half cup hot water, one tablespoon flour, small piece of butter and one teaspoon vanilla or lemon. Bake with two crusts.

MOCK MINCE PIE.—One large cup powdered crackers, two cups of sugar, one cup molasses, one cup vinegar, one cup chopped raisins, one cup warm water, one half cup butter, one teaspoon each of cloves, cinnamon, allspice and nutmeg, a little salt and essence of lemon, and two eggs. This makes three pies.—Ed.

COCOANUT CUSTARD.—One pint sweet milk, one cocoanut, grated, one and one half cups sugar, three eggs; bake in one crust.

TEA CAKES.—Beat two eggs well, add one cup sour milk, one half cup lard; beat till creamy and add two and one half cups sugar, two teaspoons lemon, soda to sweeten milk and flour to make stiff dough. Roll thin and bake in quick oven.

MRS. E. W. GANT, Grenada, Miss.

APPLE PUDDING.—Pare six large apples of a cooking variety, and remove the core by cutting from the end down into the middle, so as to leave the apple whole except where the core has been removed; place them in a deep pie dish with open part upward; next make a thin batter, using one quart sweet milk, three eggs, with sufficient flour, and pour it into and around the apples; bake in a quick oven. Serve with butter and sugar.

LIQUID SAUCE FOR PUDDINGS.—One cup of sugar and one third cup of butter rubbed to a cream; stir in the well-beaten white of one egg, flavor, add one cup of boiling water, and mix just before serving.

CORN-STARCH BLANC MANGE.—The simplest way to make the above is to put into a pail one quart of milk with a pinch of salt and four tablespoons of sugar. Let the milk get boiling hot and add to it five even tablespoons of corn-starch, rubbed smooth in a little cold water. Stir all the time until it thickens, remove from stove, flavor and pour into moulds. Place on ice or in some very cold place.

CHOCOLATE CUSTARD.—Make a boiled custard of one quart of milk, the yolks of five eggs, six tablespoons of sugar and one half cup grated chocolate. Boil until thick, stirring all the time. When nearly cold, flavor with vanilla. Pour into cups and put the whites of the eggs, beaten with powdered sugar, on the top.

MAHOGANY CAKE.—One cup sugar, one quarter cup butter, two squares of chocolate, one cup hot water, one half teaspoon soda, one teaspoon baking powder, one cup flour and one egg. Dissolve chocolate and soda in water.

CHILDREN'S SPONGE CAKE.—Put two eggs in a cup and fill cup with milk or cream, and add one cup sugar, one and one half cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, beat hard for five minutes and bake.

CREAM CAKE.—One half cup butter, one cup sugar, yolks of two eggs beaten light, one and three quarters cups sifted flour, two level teaspoons baking powder, one half cup cold water, whites of two eggs, beaten dry, and vanilla. Cream the butter, add the sugar, yolks of eggs, and water, then the flour sifted three times with the baking powder, last the whites of eggs, bake in layers or loaf.

MRS. GRACE FERNEAU, Grand Meadows, R. R. 3, Minn.

PEANUT CAKE.—One quarter cup of butter, one half cup of sugar, one egg, two tablespoons of milk, one cup flour, three quarters cup shelled peanuts. Mix and drop by teaspoonfuls on greased pans.

MRS. LILLIAN COURSEY, Click, Texas.

MARBLE CAKE.—One cup brown sugar, one half cup butter, one half cup molasses, one egg and yolks of four, three cups flour, one cup buttermilk or sour milk, one teaspoon soda and a little spice. Light part: One and one half cups white sugar, one cup sweet milk, whites of four eggs, one half cup butter, one teaspoon baking powder, two and one half cups flour, vanilla. This is sufficient for two large cakes.

LOUISE HOLST, Red Wing, Minn.

BLACKBERRY CAKE.—One cup sugar, two eggs, one half cup butter, one teaspoon soda dissolved in four tablespoons milk, one cup blackberries, one and three quarters cups flour, and one teaspoon each of cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg. Bake in moderate oven.

MRS. J. A. ANDERSON, Sherlock, Wash.

SOFT GINGERBREAD.—One cup molasses, one rounding tablespoon butter, two thirds cup milk, two cups flour, one teaspoon soda, dissolved in one third cup boiling water.

APPLE SAUCE CAKE.—One cup sugar, one half cup butter, one cup sour apple sauce, with one teaspoon soda dissolved in a little warm water and added to apple sauce till it foams: one and three quarters cups flour, a little salt, cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg and one cup raisins.

CHOCOLATE COOKIES.—Two thirds cup of molasses, two thirds cup of sugar, one half cup lard, one egg, two tablespoons cocoa, one teaspoon soda, one half teaspoon cloves, allspice and vanilla, two tablespoons hot water, flour to roll stiff.

DROP COOKIES.—One cup sugar, one cup molasses, one half cup lard; boil all four minutes. When cool add one half cup warm water, one teaspoon each soda, cloves, cassia, lemon and four cups flour, using two cups of flour and one egg, then the rest of the flour with one half teaspoon salt. Drop from spoon into greased tins and bake in moderate oven.

YEAST PANCAKES.—At night soak one third cake yeast till soft in three cups water, add flour enough to make as stiff as yeast; let rise till morning and add one teaspoon salt, one tablespoon sugar, one half teaspoon soda dissolved in warm water, beat well and cook on a hot griddle. These are fine when eggs are scarce. MRS. DORA C. DAVIS, Harding, S. Dak.

GRAHAM ROLLS.—Two cups buttermilk, two tablespoons molasses, two teaspoons soda, lard size of an egg, one half teaspoon salt, one third flour to two thirds graham. Add one egg if liked.

GRAHAM CRACKERS.—Seven cups graham, one cup thick sweet cream or butter, one pint sweet milk, two tablespoons baking powder; rub the baking powder into the flour, add the cream, with a little salt, then the milk; mix well and roll as thin as soda crackers; cut in squares, bake quickly and leave on stove for a few hours to dry thoroughly.

BRINE FOR BEEF TONGUES.—Two and one half pounds coarse salt, two gallons cold water, one ounce saltpeter, one third quart molasses. Boil and skim, when perfectly cold pour over meat.

TOMATO SWEET PICKLES.—One heaping peck green tomatoes, sliced, one cup salt, sprinkled on over night; drain and add two quarts cider vinegar, three pounds brown sugar, two pounds raisins, two tablespoons whole cloves and allspice. Boil one hour.—Ed.

GRAPE MARMALADE.—Five pounds grapes; separate skin from pulp and boil pulp twenty minutes, add two pounds seeded raisins, three oranges, no white skin, four and one half pounds white sugar. Boil five minutes. MRS. A. BRADSHAW, Jerseyville, Ont.

ANDERSON, Box 97, TENN.

DING-A-LING-A-LING:

Hello, is that Mrs. Wilkinson? Yes, and I hear every sister taking down her receiver.

Rachel Kellum, your letter is just fine. I agree with you, let the drunkards alone.

Mrs. Zada Callaway, don't you think when God calls one of His children they will go whether in city or country? I think they will.

Elnora Stud. Why did you sell your farm because your husband died? I should have worked it myself before I would have sold it.

How much I should like to meet Mrs. Lillie Davis and have a talk with her.

Mrs. Midgett, don't, I pray you, sell your farm for you will ever regret it. In this time of war and struggle I think everyone who has a farm had better keep it.

I have lived in both town and country and will come again and tell you my experience in both if I may.

Mrs. Friddell. If you will fit up one room for a nursery with all kinds of pictures, games and puzzles and have a small blackboard and have your little girl in there from nine until eleven in the morning and from one to three in the afternoon, and have her recite her lessons to you, with the rest of the day for play I think you will get along nicely.

Mrs. Long. Take pure alcohol and rub the limbs of the little sufferer. Let the father help as he is stronger; rub several times a day until the flesh glows.

I fear my talk is getting rather long, therefore must bid you all good by.

Love is the root of God's creation, therefore I send lots to Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters. A COMFORT reader,

MISS CARRIE CATES.

MINERAL WELLS, Box 140, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

In answer to our sister, Mrs. Rosa E. Baker, who wants advice on the stepmother problem, I will say first that it is indeed a very responsible position, and one that is hard to fill, especially where the relatives interfere. I believe any child can be won over by kindness and good advice, if old enough to understand, better still. I have the pleasure of being a stepmother, and have full control of two dear little boys aged five and seven years, whose mamma died two years ago of meningitis. I, being a trained nurse, was called to take care of her, and she lived only a few days. I took charge of the little motherless babies and after a reasonable length of time their father and I were married, and I have no regrets whatever.

Of course no matter how hard we may try, we cannot fill that place, and I think it is right to do all in our power, but we must have full control and manage accordingly. Too many bosses, spoil children, and you can use your own judgment, and put yourself in that dead wife's place and do your duty at any cost.

CHAPTER I.

PROVIDENCE AND MAN.

THE great banker, John Weston, sat in the library of his magnificent home in Surrey. He was a very old, but a very brave man, for he sat with a smile on his wrinkled and colorless face, the face from which years of brain strain had driven the color, the face in which the struggles, the trials, of this transient world had carved wrinkles as deeply as if they had been cut with a graver's tool; a smile, notwithstanding that the doctor who had just left him had told him that he had only a few weeks, perhaps days, to live.

When one is as old as John Weston death often comes as a relief, a discharge; the sentry is relieved at his post, and, stretching weary limbs, goes off to his rest. The soldier, scarred in many a battle, takes his discharge and limps wearily to the repose, which to him is sweeter than the glitter of gold or the rustle of fame's laurels.

And John Weston had received his death sentence with the equanimity of the brave man, and the tired veteran. He had hosts of friends, he would be sorry to leave them, yes; but sorrier still to leave the young girl, the child of a younger and dearly loved brother. The girl—she was little more than a baby—had wound herself round the heart of the great banker, as the delicate ivy winds itself round the rugged oak; and for nine years past, ever since she had been brought to his house one summer's day, to see him, John Weston had ever held her in his mind.

And now he was going to die and leave her. Well, she would not be left friendless. His sister-in-law, the widow of his elder brother, would take loving care of her; and little Edna would not be left in poverty.

As he thought of his vast wealth—how much was it; how long ago was it since he had ceased to count it?—a change came over the old man's face. The smile disappeared, the brows knit together, the eyes, still bright and keen, became cloudy as if something were weighing on his mind, something were rising from the past to disturb him, to remind him that he, who had paid his debts, with this one exception, had left one great claim, one great debt, unpaid.

He rang the bell, and, when the footman came noiselessly, with the air of respect, the bent head and discreet eyes, the master said:

"Send this letter to Mr. Burdon—at once."

The footman said, "Yes, sir," and waited.

Mr. Weston looked up.

"Well?" he asked, sternly.

"The letter, sir," explained the footman.

John Weston started slightly and smiled. Yes; it was as well he was going, going before his mind—the mind that had governed so many men, saved so many fortunes—and wrecked some—began to wane.

He wrote the letter; it was no more than a note:

"Dear Burdon: Please come at once. I mean—at once. Yours faithfully, JOHN WESTON."

He sealed the envelope in the good, old-fashioned way, and the footman dispatched a groom with the letter.

In two hours time Richard Burdon, the solid, trustworthy lawyer, was in attendance on his old client and friend.

He found Mr. Weston just sitting down to dinner, and the banker genially, affectionately, waved Mr. Burdon to a chair. They ate of the good things in those times without the fear and trembling which nowadays wait upon our repasts; and the two men enjoyed their turtle soup, filleted soles, curried chicken, roast beef, sweets and cheese; and washed down this substantial fare with hock, sherry, port and a liquor of rare old.

Such a menu is calcuated to make most of the diet faddists of these more scientific times shudder as they read; but it was on such food as this—and plenty of it—that our fathers and forefathers made England what it is; and, pondering over the degeneracies of these later times, one is tempted to fall to on like provender, exclaiming, "What was good enough for them is good enough for us!"

The two men when they had sipped their liquor of whisky, lit cigars—not cigarettes, be it noted—and then, and not till then, John Weston began to talk on business. "I'm going to die, Dick," he said as quietly, almost as casually, as if he had said, "I am going to get my hair cut."

Burdon started, but he knew his friend too well to utter an exclamation.

"Who says so?" he inquired, with a little grunt of incredulity.

"Old Mossop," replied John Weston, "and he's never wrong. Singular that, for a doctor; for, by gad! they're seldom right. But I've received the information from another and still more reliable source."

He touched his heart and smiled grimly. "I have had my suspicions for some time; that is why I sent for Mossop. And he confirmed them. Pshaw, my dear Dick, don't look so glum. A man must die some time; one can't expect to go on forever; and for my part—— Ah, well, life ceases to be amusing after three-score—and ten, and one rather longs for a change of scene. Cheer up, man! And fill your glass. Of course I sent for you about my will, Dick."

Burdon filled his glass and cleared his throat.

"I'm rather cut up, John," he said, huskily. "We've been friends, good friends, since boyhood. Well, well!" as the great banker pursed his lips and nodded, as much as to say: "Don't make me weak, old friend!"—"I take it I know your intentions. I have your will in my safe in the office. The little girl——"

"Ay, Harry's little girl!" murmured Mr. Weston, tenderly. "Yes, I'd left everything to her, Dick; but I wasn't dying then. Now I am, and with the shadow of death on me I—remember a debt I have not paid, a debt I must pay, a duty I must fulfill before I shuffle off this mortal coil. Dick, you have not forgotten Charles More, and what he did for me?"

"No, no!" responded Mr. Burdon. "A splendid fellow, a magnificent fellow——"

"A true and noble friend!" broke in John Weston. "I shall never forget that day he came and stood by my side, faced the wolves—call them, rather, a flock of sheep made frantic by fear—and saved me from ruin and disbonor. Forget! I think that when I'm in my grave the memory of it will abide with me."

Mr. Burdon nodded once or twice in emphatic assent.

"Get some paper, Dick, and let's finish this business; you'll find some in the bureau," said Mr. Weston.

The lawyer, with his cigar in the corner of his shrewd lips, went to the inlaid writing table and drew a sheet of paper toward him.

"Your will, I suppose, John?"

"Yes," said the banker. "You will find it somewhat similar to the old one, so far as regards the legacies to relations and servants. But there will be a great difference in respect to the child. This is what I want you to make out; and, for Heaven's sake, draw it up so that there can be no excuse for fighting over it!"

"I will," said Mr. Burdon. "Proceed."

Mr. Weston dictated for some minutes, and the lawyer wrote slowly and carefully; then suddenly he stopped short and, facing round, exclaimed:

"What!"

The great banker smiled.

"I thought you'd be astonished," he said, calmly, and even with a faint laugh.

"Astonished!" echoed the lawyer. "That scarcely expresses it. Do you know what you are doing, John?"

Mr. Weston nodded. "Yes; I think so."

"You are playing the part of amateur Providence—a difficult part, John! And one that is seldom played satisfactorily."

"Seldom, perhaps, but sometimes," said Mr. Weston, as calmly as before. "This may be one of the successful attempts."

Mr. Burdon stared at him with knitted brows.

"You seriously intend to dispose of this vast fortune—have you any idea how vast it is?"

"No; I suppose not."

"In this—this absurdly romantic fashion? Dispose of a fortune! You dispose of the lives, the hearts of two human beings!"

"You put it strongly, Dick," said Mr. Weston; "but I suppose that exactly describes my intentions. And why not? This money is my own." He smiled and his eyes, which had been dulled with thought, flashed with the light of pride. "I made it, how hardly, with what infinite patience, self-sacrifice and travail, even you cannot guess. It is mine, and I can dispose of it how I choose."

Mr. Burdon shrugged his shoulders, and slowly swung round to his paper again.

"That is true," he said, dryly. "I am your lawyer, your humble servant, and at your orders."

The banker rose and, crossing the room, laid his white, wasted hand on the lawyer's shoulder.

"And my friend, Dick," he said, gently. "Don't try and thwart me. I have set my heart on this little scheme of mine——"

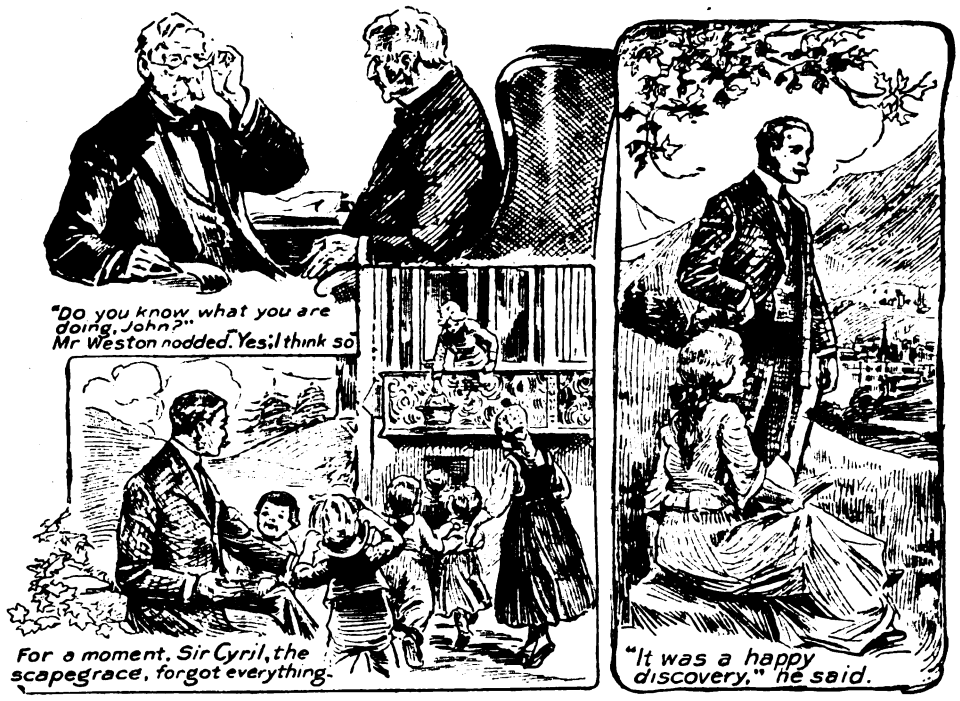
"Little!" echoed Mr. Burdon, grimly.

"Little or big, I mean you to carry it out. If you will."

Mr. Burdon stifled a groan.

"I hope to Heaven you may live to relieve me of the task!" he said, "But if you don't—well—I suppose I shall do your behest. You were always a willful man, John, always."

"That's why I succeeded," commented the great banker, with a smile. "It is your willful men who bend the world to their wills. Go on, Dick, and set it down plainly. Something tells me—dying men are permitted to indulge in presentiments, you know—that my plan will work out as I wish it. Write, Dick, write!"



The lawyer jerked his head, and wrote as John Weston dictated. At last they had both finished. Mr. Weston sank into a chair, and the lawyer began to collect the sheets of paper.

"I'll send you the draft tomorrow," he said, in the tone of a man who is being made to do something against which his legal judgment and his knowledge of the world rebel.

"Tomorrow?" murmured Mr. Weston. "Tomorrow? Sometimes there is no tomorrow, Dick. I'll sign it now."

Mr. Burdon opened his lips to oppose, but with another shrug of his shoulders, said:

"Very well. We shall want a couple of witnesses."

Mr. Weston rang for the butler and the senior footmen. In their presence he signed the will, and they duly witnessed it.

"Now that's done, light another cigar and let us talk—about matters we can agree upon, Dick," he said.

The two men talked for an hour, then Mr. Burdon rose to go.

The banker held his hand at parting a moment or two; neither of them was emotional, certainly not demonstrative, but when Mr. Weston said, "Good by, Dick," a lump rose in his friend's throat and made his responsive "Good by, John," thick and husky.

Mr. Weston retired to bed at his usual hour, and, at the usual hour, his valet went to call him.

There was no response to his knock, and, entering, he found his master lying on his side, quite calm and placid; but deaf to all knockings.

The great banker was dead.

But the will remained, to influence the lives, to become the fates of at least one man and one woman.

Would that fate mar or make their happiness?

The making of this will happened just sixteen years before our story proper commences and finds our hero at Lucerne, that most charming and lovely of the towns of the playground of Europe and America—Switzerland.

What brought Sir Cyril More to Lucerne? Had he been asked, he himself would have been, more than anyone else perhaps, puzzled for a reason. He had not come to see the beautiful lake, glittering like an emerald under its circle of hills; he did not care a button for the finest scenery. He had not come to ascend the Rigi by that marvel of modern engineering, the new railway. No, Sir Cyril didn't care so much as half a button for the most marvelous achievements of science. He had not come to gather Alpine flowers, or study Swiss manners and customs; Sir Cyril did not care for flowers; he loved one weed perhaps—tobacco, and, as to the manners and customs of the strange, placid folks who lived under the shadow of the snow-clad hills, tending their silken-haired cows and diminutive sheep—he regarded them with an indifference that was almost sublime in its intensity and density.

No; the fact was Sir Cyril had heard—in the smoking room of the "Travelers," perhaps—that Lucerne was "a quiet, downy, sleepy sort of place, you know," and being particularly in want of rest—not to say sleep—Sir Cyril had crossed the Channel, steamed up the Rhine, dreamed through Wiesbaden, Heidelberg and the Black Forest, and, at last, arrived at Lucerne quite prepared to sleep and rest. Yes, certainly he required it. Sir Cyril was thirty, and the last ten years—the last twelve, indeed—had been fast and furious; they would have been fatal, in addition, to most men, but Sir Cyril had inherited a splendid constitution with his fine fortune, and he had come out of his first campaign, in which pleasure and satiety kill more victims than fall in any other warfare, unscathed and sound, if a little weary and despondent. Yes, Sir Cyril had kept his constitution unimpaired, but his fortune!—where was it? Ask of the exquisitely dressed and painted ladies, the demi-monde, who add so much to the brilliancy of the Ladies' Mile and the Row; ask of the whist tables of the Rhododendron Club; ask of the proprietor of the "Star and Garter," and other kindred institutions, and, finally, ask of the Jews, who had kept the game going for Sir Cyril during the last two years; and they might, in the aggregate, have been able to inform you. In their words Sir Cyril had "run through it" at a pace compared with which the sharp spin at Tattenham Corner is as nothing.

The money had vanished, every available—that is to say unentailed—acre of More Park was mortgaged, the Park Lane House was let, and Sir Cyril was at Lucerne, taking breath after his race through house, and lands, and money.

And, now, have you pictured Sir Cyril? A dark, thin, haggard-looking man, with the mark of the bottle upon his face and in his eyes; a man languid and enervated with effeminate smiles, and lazy, elaborated movements? Nothing of the kind. Sir Cyril was the opposite to all these; and that, declared the mothers of marriageable daughters, was the worst of it!

Of what use was it to warn Amelia, or Sophie, or Claribel of the fearfully dangerous ineligibility of the baronet, to hint at this dreadful depravity and wickedness, to call him an extravagant spendthrift and profligate, when the man himself was blessed with an appearance that seemed at once to give the emphatic lie to the charges, one and all.

Marriageable daughters, just put through their facings in the great matrimonial market, used to look forward to seeing just such a man as you have pictured him, dear reader; and then, lo! and behold, one night at my Lady Grover's brilliant ball in would walk, with a light step, the real Sir Cyril. Tall, yes, but not dark, but fair, with close-cropped golden hair; a face almost childlike in its sweet, smiling serenity, and a mouth as delicately cut and classical as Virgil's itself; with eyes that looked down into a woman's soul; alas! with an awful power of enchantment, and a voice as deep and musical as Apollo's. So "good" did it look, so serenely handsome, that but for the firm brow, the few lines at the eyes, and the thick, tawny-gold mustache, the face might almost have been censured and condemned as effeminate.

And this was Sir Cyril, who had committed—so the mammas said—all the wickedness man was capable of; who was as daring and reckless—so the men said—as Heracles himself, and who, at the age of thirty, found himself a ruined man, with no object in life save that of killing time, and time very hard at dying.

It was a very bad case, all the worse for its having been at one time considered hopeful; for in the years gone by there had been a certain young lady of a noble house who had, so it was whispered, cast her chains around the young savage, and who would bring him, in time, into the pale of civilization again; but it had all come to nothing. Many a bashful debutante had sighed, many a world-worn belle had cast her net and set her snare for the wild young baronet, but in vain. Sir Cyril would come and sit beside them, as gentle as Shakespeare's sucking dove—would dance with them "like an angel"—would steal their hearts away—unconsciously and unwittingly, let us hope—and then smile and ride away.

And now it was hopeless. Outside the circle of mammas he was, of course, extremely popular.

Men were as proud of the friendship of Sir Cyril More as they would have been of a prince of the blood; boys fresh from college had the tall, fair-haired scapegrace, with the soft eyes, and the good-natured, serene smile, pointed out to them, and regarded him as a hero and a celebrity.

Dressed with faultless care and the most refined taste, and riding his perfect hack down the Row, or tooling his drag, with the four champing, frothing, yet business-like bays, he was one of the sights of London. Even now, when the money had run through the hole in his purse, men looked up to him, and respected his opinion as that of a man who knew the world and was to be depended on; and in most smoking-room discussions, on almost any topics which concern men, you heard his name and his dicta quoted with confident respect.

Men liked him; there was no resisting the good humor of the clear blue eyes, and the good fellowship of the almost boyishly frank smile; and Sir Cyril's enemies might have been counted upon the fingers of one hand.

His greatest was himself, of course; his next was his brother, Edward More. A certain amount of coldness in a younger brother who is next in succession to the elder, who is rapidly and assiduously making ducks and drakes of the available patrimony, is pardonable; and it certainly was not pleasant for Edward to be obliged to look on at the wasting of the estate to which he stood a fair chance of succeeding—to know, day by day, that the fortunate elder brother was cutting down the timber, mortgaging the land, and letting the whole place go to rack and ruin, that he might have the wherewithal to dissipate; but Edward More would have hated his brother Sir Cyril if the latter had been the most conservative and careful of men—if he added to and extended the estate, instead of impoverishing it.

He would have hated him for his stature, for his golden hair, for his fair, handsome face, for his very bewitching and dangerous smile; for Edward was born dark and insignificant looking, and the wicked old fairy had cursed him at his christening with that worst of all bans, an envious heart; and even now, when Sir Cyril was a far poorer man than himself—for Eward had taken to the bar, and had made money at it—he envied him.

Envied him all those gifts which misfortune had still left him, though she had bereft him of all else—the gift of a goodly presence, a cheerful, light-hearted temper, and that nameless, subtle charm which men and women find irresistible.

Though he were as rich as Crœsus, Edward knew he could not buy these, and he had a dim and bitter suspicion that they were more valued by his brother than all that he had lost; and so, though Sir Cyril was down, and Edward was up, the younger brother still hated and envied the elder.

"Poor Edward, always grim and gloomy," Sir Cyril would say, "the only man I never get on with. Rum, isn't it? Can't be the property, you know, because he's well tied-in now, and it doesn't matter. I suppose it's because I'm such a black sheep, and he is so fearfully square and proper. Poor old fellow!"

And Sir Cyril pitied—yes, pitied him!

While Edward, when he spoke of Sir Cyril—which was seldom—could find no words deep and emphatic enough in which to express his condemnation and disapproval of the scapegrace.

"He has ruined one of the finest estates in England," he would say, "and made his name a byword for every fool in the country. It is very well to call it thoughtlessness—I give such conduct a sterner and more proper name; it is shameful, sir—shameful! He is no use to himself or to the world"—"to me," that meant, no doubt—"and it would be better if he were dead!"

When this—or something like it, toned down a little—was repeated by some candid friend to Sir Cyril, he would look up with a rather puzzled and almost sad smile, and remark:

"Poor old Edward! been abusing me again? Hem! Perhaps he's right, you know; clever fellow, Edward! I'll bet anything he's right."

Be sure that that popular Sir Cyril had not come across the Channel without many remonstrances; there were men with yachts and moors who were only too anxious for his company on the deck or across the heather, and there had been invitations both numerous and eloquent. But Sir Cyril had stood firm; he had made up his mind, he said, to take rest and go in for solitude and meditation.

"Too many B. and S.'s, under the canvas, old boy; and I don't forget the whisky nights on your moor last year. No, I'll go and roam about the Swiss lakes and be good."

"Be bored, you mean," they had retorted; and he had responded with a little nod:

"Very likely; one generally gets that anywhere."

So it came to pass that he was slowly sauntering—dropping is a better expression—down the steps of the Grand, on a fine morning in September, with the glorious lake before him, and an anything but glorious Swiss band near his left ear.

He stood a moment on the quay, looking at the steamboat starting for its daily trip round the lake, then—drawing many admiring glances from the women, from the fruit-sellers to the lady tourists on the boat, after him—strolled alongside the lake for half a mile, there found a seat. Looked at the water, which was fresh and bright, then at a Saturday Review, which was stale—the week before last's—and dull. Then he got up, stroked his mustache to hide a yawn, lit a cigar, and began to climb the hill.

The reader will observe that we are very particular as to this morning's walk, for it was to be about the most eventful of any that Sir Cyril had taken.

Halfway up the hill he came upon the quaint cathedral; here he stopped for the space of three minutes and stared at the extinguisher-shaped steeples, and the fearfully ridiculous wood carving on the left side of the door, and then he was almost startled by some children's voices, piping up some kind of secular glee or religious chant. One of Sir Cyril's few virtues being an intense love for children, he turned to the left, from which direction the sound came, climbing a small hill, and found his progress stopped by a wall, then up to it and looked over.

Thereupon he saw a scene, which though common enough to the inhabitants of Lucerne, was novel and picturesque enough to interest him.

On the other side of the wall was a little playground attached to an infants' school, and in this little playground the infants aforesaid were gathered together in the form of a ring, acquiring knowledge on the pleasant kindergarten system—that is to say, they were learning arithmetic by the simple and pleasing method of singing in a kind of chanting chorus the multiplication table. Most of the children were pretty, were cruelly clean, and their voices rose in such a sweet piping conglomeration of childish treble and alto, that Sir Cyril found the effect, taken upon the whole, irresistible.

The wall was not very high, and it was the most natural thing in the world for him to clamber up. There the wild scapegrace sat, gravely lit another cigar, and enjoyed himself.

For a minute the teacher, a neat little Swiss girl, to say nothing of the children, was slightly disconcerted; but discipline and routine are great things, and after a few minutes Sir Cyril's presence was forgotten, and the multiplication table was completed, and another branch of study attacked.

This went on for ten minutes, perhaps, when at a clap of the teacher's hands the circle broke up, and the tiny mites scattered themselves about like ants, or bees.

Now was Sir Cyril's time. With the old enchanting smile and gesture he coaxed two or three of the mites toward him. It was a slow and elaborate process, for six feet Sir Cyril looked a giant, and very formidable, for all his handsome face—and the few, soft, coaxing words were English, and lost much of their persuasiveness; but at last, much to his delight, one little atom of a child—a little girl, of course—boldly approached near enough, and in five minutes Sir Cyril had three boys and girls on the wall beside him, and a swarm around his feet below him.

Then he got out his watch—one of Dent's gold repeaters—and lured a brown-haired little girl to listen to the tick, and spy into the inside; he found a handful of coins and disposed of them, and was just in the middle of a hearty laugh at the audacity of a busy little fellow of six, who was attempting to pull himself up by the aid of his pants—trousers—when the little girl who was examining the mechanism of the watch, much to its improvement and her own delight, suddenly uttered a cry of joy, and clapped her hands, dropping the watch with sublime indifference.

Sir Cyril pocketed his shattered repeater, and then looked up to ascertain the cause of the child's sudden hilarity, and, following the direction of her eyes, saw—well, what he had seen a thousand times before—a girl in a balcony.

Yes, many a time had he played the part of Romeo to various Juliets, and survived the passion and the poetry of that sublime balcony scene; but he had never seen a face like this, and he recognized the novelty and the power of it at the first upward glance.

Then it rested or shone upon two small, white hands, the dark brown eyes looking down upon him and the children with a grave, pleasant regard, the sweet, ripe lips parted with a smile, the head slanted sideways a little, to avoid the downpour of the sun.

Sir Cyril looked down again quickly, lest the eyes should turn aside, then glanced up again, and took a long look of unalloyed enjoyment.

What a face it was!—not so beautiful as many he had seen, but how sweet, how pure, how childlike, and yet how womanly! It seemed to him, sitting there, that one of the pure, lily-faced children had suddenly grown up into a woman, retaining all its childlike innocence and trustful dignity with the gain of a woman's soul and a woman's intelligence. For a moment, Sir Cyril, the

Childhood Adventures on a Texas Ranch

SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE.

"Toughey" is a true story in which the author narrates the actual exploits and adventures of her three children and her own experiences during a summer, some dozen years ago, happily spent in rusticating on her ranch in a remote and somewhat wild part of Texas, far from their city home. This large domain, known as Steiner Valley, was inherited by Mrs. Burleson from her father, Dr. Steiner, who as surgeon in the U. S. army served with distinction through the war with Mexico which added Texas and an empire besides to the territory of the United States.

In mentioning herself and her husband (now Postmaster General, but then member of Congress) in the story she has modestly assumed the name of "Deering" which our readers are at liberty to change to Burleson.

The ranch, which is several miles in extent, is in part cultivated as a cotton plantation and the rest is used as a range for Mr. Burleson's great herd of Hereford cattle. The plantation is worked entirely by convict labor supplied by the state in return for a certain per cent of the crop, and besides the manager's house and the owner's summer cottage there is a cluster of buildings called "the camp" occupied by the convicts and guards.

All this is new and of somewhat startling interest to the children who are accustomed to city life.

According to the habit of the family, the two younger girls, with only a year's difference in their ages and being fast friends and playmates, are classed together under the generic designation of "the children." The eldest daughter, who, though only twelve years old, is several years their senior and bears herself toward them with a patronizing air of elderly dignity and wisdom that at times is somewhat galling to the little girls, is nicknamed "Toughey." This pet name had been conferred on her in babyhood by a college girl aunt in admiration of the child's coolness, grit and self-reliance manifest even at that tender age.

Len, the manager's son, is a bright boy and proves a faithful and efficient guide and assistant on excursions and outdoor sports.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ESCAPED CONVICT.

THE sky was bright with sunset colors when Toughey started across the cotton field for the spring by the river.

Giving her pony a free rein, the spirited mustang bounded along the road with glancing eye and expressive ears, never slacking his pace until he reached the gate leading from the field into the river bottom which just here formed a kind of shelf projecting over the stream. At its edge grew a giant sycamore, whose roots washed bare by successive floods, sprawled in every direction like the tentacles of some monster devil fish.

From a hollow at one side of the tree flowed the spring, and its course a few feet distant to the edge of the bluff, over which it fell in a hundred rivulets to the river, was marked by a rich growth of ferns and cress, the object of Toughey's ride. Mr. Deering was expected on the evening train and the supper table must be decorated with fern and he was to have a salad of the delicate watercress. She must hurry, for although she could quickly cover the short mile and a half that lay between her and Pecan Grove, the skies were already paling and she remembered that darkness comes swiftly in Texas.

Passing through the gate and making her way to the sycamore, she dismounted and, leaving her bridle to trail on the ground, walked to the edge of the hollow. Its depth was as great as she was high and somewhat wider. The side was precipitous and she must either kneel at its edge and gather the plants by reaching over, or jump down into the marshy bottom which meant a thorough wetting of her shoes. There was no approach from the opposite bank which rose to the height of a cliff.

To Toughey's eyes the tenderest cress grew close to the edge where the spring's water dropped to the river below, but to reach it seemed impractical if not impossible. Pausing to consider, she walked along under the big trees and looked down at the river washing and wearing the face of the cliff. It was red and swollen from recent rains and so high that many of the long roots of the sycamore touched the water. Retracing her steps, an idea occurred to her which she immediately acted upon.

Throwing herself on the ground and winding one arm securely around a thick root hanging over the hollow where the spring was situated, she proceeded to lower herself and thus bring the coveted cress within reach of her other arm. But with the strain of her weight came a rush of gravel and an ominous crack, and then a great rough hand reached out from somewhere and seized her and a rough voice said:

"Lookout, Miss!"

As the treacherous root parted, Toughey found herself standing in the grasp of a convict but for whose timely aid she might have been sprawling on the wet, spongy bed of the hollow.

The girl stared at him with large eyes and a white face, too shaken to speak.

"Don't be scared, Miss," he said soothingly, "you're not hurt and I don't think you could a' fell to the river."

Toughey rallied a little at his words, and recognized him as the "trusty" who brought them fresh vegetables every day from the camp, but she was still too disturbed to feel any surprise at his sudden appearance in so unexpected a place.

"You're gettin' wet here, Miss," said the man, looking down at her feet which were half hidden in the bed of the shallow stream in which they stood, "and you better go home," he added respectfully with a glance at the sky, now showing the pallor of late evening.

Toughey turned mechanically and with his assistance clambered out of the hollow.

The action seemed to clear her faculties and with a sudden misgiving she said:

"What are you doing here, Hart?"

The man shifted his position uneasily and seemed to be hesitating for a reply.

Toughey was seized with a vague fear but she realized the necessity of self control. During her ride to the spring, she remembered to have seen the long line of convicts on their homeward march across the field to the Camp. The thought now flashed upon her that he was trying to run away. The lateness of the hour, the loneliness and remoteness of the place and the absence of any reason for his presence there, all combined to strengthen the suspicion.

"Where are you going, Hart?" she asked.

Again the man hesitated and then said quietly:

"Home, Miss."

Toughey was startled. To her mind, a runaway convict was the most desperate of all mankind. With the discovery of his absence would come relentless pursuit by armed men and trained dogs. And yet he spoke as quietly as if in answer to some trivial question.

But under this calm exterior he might even now be considering some ferocious deed. Suppose he should kill her and seize her pony for his flight? But the thought had hardly formed in her mind when it was followed by a feeling of shame. He had just saved her from a fall, perhaps something worse—with a quick shudder and glance at the river and the sloping bed of the hollow—and Toughey was too generous not to make full acknowledgment of the man's service and to reject as base the idea that he could harm her.

"But," she hurried to say, "how dreadful it would be if you were caught!" And Toughey shuddered. She knew that the Penitentiary rules required his pursuers to shoot an escaping convict, and to draw blood under penalty of dismissal from the service.

"It isn't likely, Miss," said the man, "I swum down the river a mile and clumb up here by the roots and bushes. The dogs haven't any trail."

Toughey looked at him aghast; the feat seemed an impossible one.

"'Tisn't as hard as it sounds," said the convict deprecatingly, "I done it onct when I was a boy. I was raised just ten mile from here straight acrosst the mountains an' I know every inch of this river and the bottom."

"But," she continued protestingly, "It's wrong for you to run away!"

"No, Miss, it isn't," said the man with a touch of excitement, "my little girl's dyin' and I must go. She's calling for me."

Toughey was silent. There was no answer to such an argument.

"You see Miss, it's like this," continued the convict, "I've got six children near 'bout like you and your little sisters, and this un's the oldest that done everything when her ma was poorly. And when the letter come this mornin' saying as she couldn't live mor'n a day or so——" the man paused a moment and his face worked—"I made up my mind that there wasn't any law on earth what could keep me from goin' to her."

Toughey's young heart contracted with pain at the convict's story and she looked at him with a sympathy too great for words.

At that moment the whistle of the incoming train sounded in the distance.

The convict started, and leaping lightly to the level where Toughey stood said:

"You wouldn't tell on me, now, would you Miss?"

The color rose to Toughey's face and she turned from him with a gesture of such indignant protest that he added apologetically:

"I know you're mighty kind, Miss. You and the little girls have done me many a favor this summer, but I was most afraid you'd think you ought to tell."

He lingered uncomfortably a moment, as if he wanted to say more and then started at a swift pace down the bottom.

"Stop," commanded Toughey seizing her pony by the bridle and half running towards the convict. He paused.

"Ride him!" she exclaimed impetuously, thrusting the bridle into his hand.

The man hesitated but his eyes glistened.

"I can make it easy in two hours——" he began.

"No, no, you must ride," she insisted.

"I aimed to catch a mule in the pasture, Miss," he said looking longingly at the fleet little animal.

"No, no," said Toughey impatiently. "Hurry or you may be too late!" At these words he yielded. The thought of his dying child pressed upon his heart. With a hurried "God bless you, Miss, I'll send your pony back," he mounted the mustang and an instant later had disappeared in the thick timber.

Toughey now sped along under the trees, through the field gate and along the darkening road in a state of feverish exalation. She ran until she was out of breath and then walked until she had regained it and could run again.

The stars thickened above her and the dim outline of Pecan grove faded altogether from view. Now and then she swerved as a startled dove flew up at her approach or a drifting cloud made some goblin shape in the road.

But she was not dismayed. Her heart was beating high with enthusiasm at the part she had played in the fortunes of the unfortunate convict. To have trusted him with her dearest possession, her pony, was to do the most that lay in her power. At first no doubt of the man's sincerity or the righteousness of her own course came to disturb her. Only for the pony did she feel any misgiving as the thought of the wild ride across the mountains brought with it a pang which she vainly strove to subdue. That the convict would return him or that he would keep the pony until the manager could send for him, she was sure, but there was hard work ahead of him tonight and she suddenly felt chilled and dispirited by the realization. She found herself wondering why she had not permitted the fellow to catch a mule as he proposed and as was usualy done by run-away convicts. In such cases the mule was turned loose and made its way back to the Plantation unless (and this happened sometimes) he was ridden to death. Toughey shuddered. Why had she not thought of this before? Then she felt shocked by her own ingratitude and tried to push it from her. But gradually with slow and halting steps, at first, then more swiftly and persistently came the suggestion that the convict had told a story intended to disarm and deceive her.

And so the struggle went on until, weary in mind and exhausted by violent physical exertion, the girl dropped into a slow walk. The way was long even for her young feet and impetuous spirit; the night was warm and the Gulf breeze not yet astir.

When she finally reached Pecan Grove and opened the gate leading into the inclosure about the house, she could hear the children calling her. They had missed her. No one had been in the secret of her trip to the spring but Nurse, who was too busy in the kitchen to know that she had not returned.

The rumble of the farm wagon that had brought her father from the station could still be faintly heard. Her absence was evidently just beginnfng to cause a stir. Her mother was standing at the end of the gallery looking anxiously into the darkness and even Mr. Deering, who did not so easily take alarm, had left his chair and walked down the steps into the circle of light made by the lamp in the hallway.

Toughey tried to call, but a dry sob filled her throat and no one was aware of her coming until she had approached near enough to be seen. A general outcry greeted her appearance, but was followed by silence as the girl without a word walked straight into her father's arms and clinging to him burst into tears.

Half lifting her he seated himself in a chair on the gallery and gently stroking her hair waited until she had regained her self-control and raised her head from his shoulder. Her mother knelt at her side in quiet distress and the children stood by holding hands, and hardly knowing whether to laugh or to cry.

"What is it, daughter?" her father finally asked in a soothing tone.

"Oh, it's all dreadful!" began Toughey completely unnerved by exhaustion and reaction from the mental excitement through which she had passed.

"Tell the whole story, Toughey, from start to finish, leaving out nothing," said her father in a tone of quiet command.

Thus admonished the girl gave a plain, simple account of her experience at the spring, never once interrupting herself. She might have faltered in her story could she have seen her father's stern, set face and the sudden pallor that swept over her mother and made her sway even on her knees when Toughey came to her encounter with the convict.

But the darkness was friendly and hid their white faces, and she finished with something of her old spirit and eager to know if her father approved of what she had done.

He was slow of speech tonight this big father of hers, she thought wonderingly, and mamma too was over quiet. Toughey did not know that they had looked for a moment into a gulf, the blackness of which she could not even imagine.

At last Mr. Deering spoke and what he said was comforting; but there was no general discussion of the adventure as was usual on such occasions, and she and the children were sent early to bed, while their father and mother talked in low sober tones far into the night. Toughey lay awake for a long time with ears strained to catch the sound of a pony's hoofs, but fell asleep hearing only the shrill cry of the katydids and the wierd scream of the screech owl.

* * * * * * * * * * *

The next morning Mr. Deering went early to the Camp and remained late. For several days thereafter he made frequent trips to the post-office across the river, sent numerous telegrams, did considerable telephoning and wrote some letters.

By the end of a week it was fully established that Hart had been born in the adjoining county and lived there for fifty years, bearing the reputation of an honest, law-abiding, hard-working citizen. That on last Christmas he had celebrated the day by taking—contrary to his custom—a glass or two of whiskey with his nephew and afterwards going with him to collect a debt. High words passed between his nephew and his nephew's debtor, pistols were drawn, shots exchanged, and a man fell dead at Hart's feet before he had time to utter a word of protest. An immediate arrest followed and Hart was put in jail, accused of being accessory to a murder.

Frightened by the prospect of a long term of imprisonment and overreached by a designing and unscrupulous district attorney, Hart pled guilty thereby securing for himself the lightest penalty attaching to the crime,—two years in the State Penitentiary, and assuring to the prosecutor his fee. His innocence could have been easily proven, but so great was his horror and confusion of mind at his own situation that the possibility of an acquittal did not even occur to him, and his case was painted to him in such black colors by the attorney that his chief concern was to pursue the course by which his family would suffer least—his faithful wife and innocent children.

These facts, added to his record on the farm as an obedient, industrious convict, made such a clear, strong case of wrong against him that Mr. Deering had no difficulty in securing a pardon for him from the Governor.

And one bright morning while papa's voice was still vibrant with the pathos of Hart's story in its final telling to Mrs. Deering, Toughey and the children, they saw the old fellow entering their enclosure, mounted on a horse of his own and leading Toughey's pony glossy from the care that had been given it. There had been no pursuit of Hart and he knew that some beneficent and powerful influence had been at work in his behalf. But his face was worn and sober, for although his child had recovered from her dangerous illness, he was now returning to months of hard labor and separation from those to whom he owed care and support.

Approaching the covered porch which was used by the family as a sitting-room and where they were all gathered, he took off his hat respectfully and dismounting handed the pony's bridle to Toughey, who with the children had run forward to greet the little beast, hanging about his neck and kissing his soft nose.

It was Mr. Deering's wish that Hart should not be told of the pardon awaiting him at the hands of the Manager. It was fitting that following the line of duty, he should return to the Camp and give himself up to the authority of the state.

But the necessity for keeping the secret aim it unbalanced the children and resulted in such antics that even the old man through all his heavy despondency, became conscious that something unusual had occurred.

Their excitement culminated in an explosive stage whisper to Toughey:

"Can't we tell?"

"No. Its!" exclaimed Toughey in a sternly repressive voice and resorting to extreme but forcible slang.

Their mother laughed outright at this dialogue and even Mr. Deering could not repress a smile.

Hart finally yielded to the note of cheerfulness in all that was said and done, and went on his way to the Camp with a vaguely happy smile on his face that made Mr. Deering say after he had left:

"The old fellow has guessed what's coming to him."

"We didn't tell," piped the children.

"Oh, of course not!" said Toughey with unfathomable sarcasm.

Later in the day when Hart returned in citizen's clothes, the old convict garb discarded forever, no one at first knew him. He came to thank them and he did so with a simple reiteration that bespoke an intensity of feeling, taking no account of form.

So difficult did it appear for the old man to bring his expressions of gratitude to a conclusion, that Mr. Deering fairly ran him away, urging upon him the necessity for getting to his mountain home before nightfall and relieving the unhappiness of his wife and children. But his eyes glistened as he watched the dull old figure take its way on horseback along the pasture road until it disappeared behind the cedars.

Boys, as well as girls, must be watched and care must be taken of their habits. My husband being an exception and a Christian, with a sweet, kind and loving disposition, makes life really worth living. I sincerely hope you will succeed in your undertaking and God bless you.

Trust in the Heavenly Father and all will end well for you. Sincerely, a COMFORT sister, MRS. J. B. BREWTON.

ACEQUIA, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my third attempt to gain admittance in your cozy corner, but I tried to write on a special subject and there were so many better letters written that I am glad they were accepted instead of mine.

I do so enjoy the letters where the sisters give a description of the country and places where they live. I think it is very educational.

As I have never seen a letter from this part of Idaho, it may be of some interest to someone to hear from a resident of one of "Uncle Sam's" projects. We live on what is known as the Minidoka Government irrigated project situated in southern Idaho.

This country is or was, I might say, a vast sagebrush desert until Uncle Sam reclaimed it and built a great dam across the mighty Snake river and raised the water until it could flow in a canal and from thence into smaller ditches to each farm unite. We have a homestead of ninety acres, have about fifty acres cleared of sagebrush and ditches made so as to irrigate about sixty acres, the rest we use for pasture.

The public road is on our east line and the railroad on our west line; our place is one of the outer edge places and for that reason we have access to a vast open country for cattle, horse and sheep range. Might say we raise all kinds of fruits and vegetables, except the very tropical kinds. Cut three crops of alfalfa.

Rupert is our leading town and has the name of being the most modern up-to-date town of its size in the world. Electricity is furnished from the great power house at the dam.

Although the early settlers have experienced hard times the project is past the critical point, and we all are proud to know our names are linked with those who have "Made the Desert Blossom."

I am mother of seven children, one dear boy went on before last May; although our family circle here has been broken I know I have one "Treasure laid up in Heaven."

I receive much benefit in many ways from the Sisters' Corner and principally on child training.

We all love Uncle Charlie and Mr. Gannett and you Mrs. Wilkinson, your editorial and replies are truly inspiring and ennobling.

Wishing health, happiness and prosperity to all COMFORT sisters and COMFORT's noble staff, I remain your COMFORT sister, MRS. F. A. DENO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING EVENTS.

Alice and May Weston receive an invitation to a farewell reception, given to William Curtis Marchmont, the adopted son of Roland Fletcher, who is engaged to Alice, and is to enter Yale College. Alice is to study law with Judge Ashburton, whose daughter was the wife of Roland Fletcher. Her health failing their daughter Olive is sent, when a baby, to her grandfather, Judge Ashburton, living then in Philadelphia. Imogen Ingraham's mother, Mrs. Farquahar, marries Judge Ashburton. She dies, and Imogene, as the widow of Robert Ingraham and homeless, is invited by Judge Ashburton to accept a home with him and care for Olive. She conceals the birth of her child.

Roland Fletcher, assisted by Olive and Imogen on his left, Judge Ashburton and Will on his right receive their guests. Imogen and Olive, jealous of the attentions given to Alice, ignore her half-extended hand. Mr. Fletcher mortified and displeased receives her most cordially and welcomes her to Castleview. Later he leads her in a quadrille, after which they go into a long corridor. Stopping before a painting Alice learns it is the portrait of Mr. Fletcher's wife. He wishes nothing better for her, than she may be as happy with his boy, as he was with his wife. Will joins them and Olive passes without a word of greeting. Mr. Fletcher follows Olive and requests that she be more courteous to her guests. Will goes to Yale. Judge Ashburton opens his office in town with Alice as his clerk. May is busy. Olive and Imogen out driving. Olive proposes they call for her grandfather. Imogen orders Buxton to drive to the office. Olive takes the lines, Judge Ashburton insists that Alice, who is suffering from a headache, shall ride home. A newspaper caught in the wind, frightens one of the horses and both spring forward. Olive drops the lines and Alice, with rare presence of mind secures them and controls the horses. Judge Ashburton and the driver take Alice home. He reprimands Imogen and Olive for their indifference and failure to thank Alice and realizes a phase in Imogen's character, hitherto concealed. Mr. Fletcher calls upon Mrs. Weston and Alice and expresses his gratitude.

Will's last vacation comes. Judge Ashburton arranges a little excursion which includes Alice and May Weston. Arriving at their destination, they meet Arthur Stamford, in love with Alice Weston, his father Sir Arthur Stamford, Mr. Tom Radcliffe and his sister, Miss Grace. Tom Radcliffe proposes a visit to the caves. Alice Weston and Grace Radcliffe become separated from the party. Alice stopping to tie her shoe Grace goes on. Alice's candle goes out. She feels a grip on her arm and a gruff voice inquires if she knows a woman by the name of Ingraham who lives at Castleview and requests her to send a letter, which he thrusts into her hands. Arthur Stamford returns to find Alice and asks her to be his wife. She admits her love for and engagement to another. In the meanwhile Sir Arthur evinces unusual interest in Will Marchmont and learns to his astonishment that his middle name is Curtis. His mother, Mabel Randal Curtis, was Sir Arthur's second wife, whose first husband was the second son of Lady Marchmont—the Marquise of Leith. A visit to Lady Marchmont confirms Will's parentage and his right to Marchmont Court. He visits Alice, assuring her that nothing can part them and in one year she will be his wife, the future Marquise of Leith.

CHAPTER X.

"A MAN OF HONOR."

"BUT, Will," Alice began, faintly, her breath almost taken away at the thought of wearing a coronet—of becoming the Marquise of Leith.

"Hush, Alice!" the young man interposed, with gentle authority, "you wrong me; you impute to me a cowardly thought which never, for a moment, has entered my mind, by intimating that any condition in life over which I have any control would be allowed to separate us. You and I pledged ourselves to each other three years ago, and, God willing, we will redeem that pledge when my course is completed, just one year from now. Now, dear, I know that you love me, and you are all the world to me; therefore, no false pride no laws of so-called caste can ever come between us."

"But, Lady Marchmont—your grandmother—will not she refuse to receive me—the daughter of a common farmer?" murmured Alice, but with a note of intense joy vibrating in her tones in view of her lover's loyalty to his troth and to herself.

"I do not know how Lady Marchmont may receive the announcement of my relations with you," Will gravely returned. "I had no opportunity today to speak to her of our engagement. I shall do so, however, immediately upon my return to Leith. But, love, it would make no difference if the whole of England objected; I should marry you all the same, and for the simple reason that to lose you would plunge me into a state of despair which the whole of England—or even the world—could not alleviate."

A long, long sigh of relief escaped the fair girl, and her pulses leaped with joy at this blessed assurance.

"How grand—how noble you are, Will!" she breathed, as she lifted her face from his breast and laid her lips softly against his cheek.

"I am the same 'Will' that I was when I left you this morning to go to Leith," he responded, chidingly. "The simple fact that I have had wealth and greatness thrust upon me, instead of being obliged to earn it, to offer you, is all the difference there is. I do not think I am quite as proud of the one fact as I should have been of the other; still," he added, with a joyous laugh, "it has its compensations, and I am not disposed to quarrel with fate, since it will enable me to secure my prize so much the sooner and place my wife in a position she is so well fitted to grace."

He drew her fondly back into their seat, where they continued to talk of what had occurred, and of their future, for another hour or more.

Both felt that it would be a trial to be separated during the remainder of their vacation; but Will asserted that he should drive over from Leith as frequently as possible, and that he should write every day.

The following week found him domiciled at Leith, greatly to Lady Marchmont's satisfaction, and where, under the direction of Mr. Snelling, he began at once to inform himself regarding the condition of the estate and its magnificent resources.

On the second evening after his arrival he confided to Lady Marchmont the fact of his engagement to Miss Alice Weston, of Windsor.

The aristocratic old lady was at once all on the alert.

"And who may Miss Alice Weston be?" she inquired, with considerable stateliness.

"She is a charming young lady, your ladyship," Will smilingly returned, but flushing at her manner; "thoroughly educated—a protegee, so to speak, of Judge Ashburton, who, I am confident, will assure you that she is more than worthy to fill the position which it is my privilege to offer her."

"But—who—what are her antecedents? What is her family?" demanded Lady Marchmont, with clouded eyes.

"Her mother is a widow—a sweet, refined woman; and she has one sister who is almost as charming as herself. Her father was, at one time, steward at Castleview, during Lord Ellerton's day. He amassed a considerable property while with him but later lost it all through the dishonesty of others, besides finding himself in debt, a misfortune which broke his heart and resulted in his death," Will explained.

His companion's face had grown very grave and became very much flushed as she listened.

"My dear William," she began, with evident constraint, as he concluded, "cannot you see that it will never do for you to marry this young woman, however charming she may be? Why, the whole country would ring with the story of such a misalliance—the Marquis of Leith marry the daughter of a common farmer!—it would never do."

Will was silent for a moment—just long enough to get himself well in hand before replying to sentiments against which his whole soul arose in rebellion.

"Your ladyship," he said, with a dignity equal to her own, "I do not regard the matter in any such light. Miss Weston is, as I have told you, a beautiful and accomplished girl. She was educated at the noble establishment of Madam B—— in Windsor, and graduated with honors—her class comprising some of the daughters of the nobility among their number. I became betrothed to her nearly three years ago with the consent and hearty approval of my guardian. I am a man of honor, I trust. I love her devotedly, and I shall marry her as soon as I have completed my course in law."

Will appeared very manly and noble as he firmly, yet courteously, delivered himself of the above arguments and their ultimatum, and Lady Marchmont realized at once that she had no weakling to deal with.

She saw that her grandson, although not lacking in reverence and admiration for her, had a mind of his own and would never submit to leading strings, at least where a principle was involved.

But he had intimated that he had no intention of marrying under a year, and, she mentally argued, much might happen in that time to interfere with the consummation of his plans.

Her ladyship had a pronounced diplomatic tendency in her nature, and she wisely resolved not to antagonize him at the outset regarding his plans for the future, but trust to fate and her own clever management to interpose some insuperable barrier to this exceedingly objectionable union.

"Well, my son," she smilingly responded, "you and I will not quarrel over the situation. Since you have pledged yourself to this young lady, and she is so necessary to your happiness, you will, of course, put me in a way to become acquainted with her, and let me judge for myself if she is worthy of you; for"—laying her hand fondly upon his arm—"let me tell you, I shall demand a great deal in the woman who is to become the wife of my grandson and the future Lady of Leith."

"Thank you," Will earnestly returned, and thinking her very lovely to concede the point so gracefully, while he had not the slightest fear regarding what her verdict in connection with Alice would be. "I shall be delighted to have you meet Miss Weston, and, since it would be inconvenient for you to go so far to call upon her, if you would bid her come to you for a little visit, at your convenience, you would have ample opportunity to study her character."

Lady Marchmont was secretly amused at the thought of going to "call" upon this unknown flower by the wayside, and she also flushed with something of annoyance over having been taken so literally at her word, but after considering the situation for a moment or two, she resolved to turn it to her own advantage.

"How would it do to ask her here for a few days previous to the reception which I am arranging for you?" she inquired.

"You are very kind," Will replied, with beaming eyes. "That will be very agreeable to me; and I also desire, with your approval, to send cards to Mrs. Weston and Miss May for that event."

"Very well, it shall be as you wish," his companion complaisantly returned, while she was saying to herself that, doubtless, when he should see these common people—peasants, as she regarded them—mingling with the aristocracy of the country, the contrast would be so marked that he would be convinced that it would never do to choose a wife from such a humble walk of life. She actualy chuckled aloud, when thinking it over later, in view of her diplomacy, which she felt sure would result in making the young man ashamed of his rustic fiancee, and so bring about the rupture she so earnestly desired.

Now, Lady Marchmont was by no means a cold-hearted or intriguing woman. Hers really was a noble and lovely character, and she possessed a gentle and sympathetic spirit; but she was intensely proud along certain lines, and, although she had not been of noble birth herself—being the daughter of a clergyman—she felt that there must be no backward steps, and she must marry her grandson to one who was at least his equal in point of birth and position.

But, a little later, she wrote a kind and friendly note to Alice, begging her to come to Leith for the week preceding the proposed reception, for which she inclosed cards to Mrs. Weston and May, as she had been requested to do.

Alice, not realizing, of course, all that was involved in this invitation, was deeply touched by this mark of condescension—for such she well knew it would be regarded by the world—and sent a graceful reply of appreciation and acceptance.

Mrs. Weston politely declined, but May was enthusiastic over the prospect of once more seeing something of the grand social life which she had so enjoyed at Castleview and both sisters at once began their preparations for the coming event.

Meantime Imogen Ingraham had received the letter which Alice had posted at the request of the mysterious person whom she had encountered in the caves, and which proved to be but another demand for money from the detective whom she so feared. She dare not refuse him, and so mailed the amount he named to the address he had inclosed.

Both she and Olive were greatly astonished over the news regarding Will, and returned immediately to Castleview upon receiving Mr. Fletcher's letter in which he requested them to do so.

Olive at once resolved that she would "move heaven and earth" to win the man whom she loved and who now had it in his power to gratify her ambition in point of position, which made him a hundred-fold more desirable than ever before.

Imogen also, although heretofore she had not been very enthusiastic in view of a union between the two, now became most earnestly desirous to consummate the marriage.

The prospect was a brilliant one for her darling, and once she was the wife of Will and the Marquise of Leith, she felt that she could then face the detective who had so long persecuted her, and defy him to do his worst, for Olive would be so firmly established in her position that her crime could not seriously affect her, even though she might be repudiated as the heiress of Castleview and of Judge Ashburton's fortune.

She was even more strongly determined to accomplish this result when, after another visit from Sir Arthur Stamford, she learned that there was a large sum of money coming to Will from his mother's fortune, the railroad magnate having died very wealthy. Believing herself to be childless, she had willed all she possessed to her husband and his son; but Sir Arthur informed Will and Mr. Fletcher that his conscience would not allow him to retain it under existing circumstances, and he wished to make it over to the rightful heir, saying that his son would, even then, have an abundance.

He was not permitted to make the entire renunciation he contemplated, for neither Will nor his guardian would listen to it; but a compromise was affected whereby the consciences of all were satisfied, and which served to cement, even more strongly, the bond of friendship between the two families.

About a week after the return of Imogen and Olive, the family at Castleview drove to Leith to spend a couple of days, at Lady Marchmont's invitation.

They were most cordially received, and as Olive exerted herself to appear at her best—and she really was very bright and winning when she chose to be—her ladyship found herself strongly attracted toward her.

Their visit proved to be a most delightful one, part of the time being devoted to drives about the estate, and the remainder to roaming over the great mansion and inspecting its many treasures.

"It is the loveliest place in the world, Will!" Olive enthusiastically exclaimed, as on their way down-stairs, after completing their tour, they paused before a rose window over the front entrance, which, being open, commanded a magnificent view of the young man's fair domain.

"It is, indeed," he admitted, "a proud inheritance; but I can hardly realize, even yet, that it is mine."

"And yet you are going away," said Olive, reproachfully.

"Yes—I must finish my course; you know I never could endure to half do anything."

"No—that is true; still, there is really no need now that you should fit yourself for any profession, and—and, Will, it is so lonely when you are away. It is hard enough to know that you have left Castleview for good; but I wish that—you need not put the ocean between us again," Olive plaintively returned, with downcast eyes and flushed cheeks.

"Thank you—but really, Olive, I had no idea that I was of so much importance," Will retorted, with a light laugh.

"Hadn't you?" queried the girl, and sweeping him a coy look from beneath her silken lashes, "You have something to learn then. Oh, Will, don't—please don't go."

"Why, Olive!" her companion exclaimed, and bestowing a puzzled glance upon her, "I never dreamed that either my coming or going was of any special consequence to you—never supposed that my poor, unworthy self would be so regretted."

"No, you do not seem to realize—anything," Olive burst forth, with passionate vehemence. "But, oh! I wish there were no such place in the world as America."

"Bless my stars! Sister Olive! I would not have believed you could utter a sentiment so disloyal to your native land," cried Will, in laughing surprise.

"America isn't my native land," she pouted. "I was born in Rome."

"True. I had forgotten that; but——"

"And I am not your sister, either; we are not related at all," Olive interposed, with quivering lips.

The young man started, and a peculiar expression flitted over his face. He looked both wounded and perplexed.

"Pardon me," he said, "if I have given offense by calling you sister; but we have lived so long under the same roof you have grown to seem almost like a sister to me, and I had flattered myself that I had gained sisterly affection in your heart."

"Oh, Will! I never meant anything like that! You know better," the girl cried out sharply, while some crystal drops flashed out upon her lids.

"Then why did you object to my calling you 'sister'?" he innocently demanded.

Olive lifted her swimming eyes to him for an instant, and his heart gave a startled bound of dismay as he read the story revealed in their blue depths, and also in the crimson wave which swept over her fair face and dyed even her white neck with a roseate hue.

He could not have been understood if her lips had given utterance to the words—"Because no sister loves as I love you."

At that moment voices behind them warned them that others were near, and Olive started in pretended confusion.

"There comes auntie," she said, "I must speak with her."

She darted away, speeding lightly down the hall, leaving her companion amazed and dismayed at the discovery he had made.

"Whew!" he ejaculated, under his breath, "this is awkward! I never dreamed of any such contretemps—I certainly never meant to make mischief like that!"

CHAPTER XI.

A VISIT TO THE MARQUISE OF LEITH.

The thought of love in connection with Olive Fletcher had never entered his mind until that moment.

They had always been good friends and genial companions during the years which they had spent together in the same house.

Olive was ever at her best with him, and, being a decidedly pretty girl, he had enjoyed taking her out to fetes and parties and playing escort, in an elderly brotherly way, to various places of amusement.

But the idea of making her his wife had never suggested itself to him before, and he felt exceedingly uncomfortable in view of the knowledge that she had surrendered her affections to him.

It gave him almost a sense of guilt, as if he had unconsciously wronged and robbed his guardian after all his kindness to him.

He bitterly regretted that little episode in the rose window, and the memory of it embarrassed him, try hard as he would to overcome the feeling, and—although he tried to be especially kind to Olive—he found himself avoiding another tete-a-tete with her during the remainder of her visit.

The feeling was not allowed to be forgotten after her departure, either, for Lady Marchmont neglected no opportunity to launch forth most eloquently into praises of Olive—her beauty, her grace of manner, the fact that she was a great heiress, and, being the daughter of the distinguished Mr. Fletcher, would doubtless make a brilliant mariage, etc., etc.

Will quietly admitted the truth of all she said, but did not manifest by the slightest sign that he suspected the purpose which inspired her eulogies.

"He is very wise," her ladyship said to herself, with mingled admiration and amusement; "he is bound not to antagonize me in any way; but he knows his own mind, and I shall have to manage him very cleverly, if I am to save him from making a lifelong mistake. Of course, before he knew his origin—believing himself to have been a child of the slums—it was well enough for him to choose any respectable young woman, who was his equal in point of culture, to be his wife; but, really, the Marquis of Leith must mate only with his equal by birth. But I will try to be patient—I will not judge him too severely until I have seen his rustic beauty."

And she found herself looking eagerly forward to the coming of Alice Weston.

And Alice herself felt that this visit would be a very trying one to her. She knew, as well as if she had been told, that it was to be one of critical inspection—that she would be measured, weighed and gauged, according to Lady Marchmont's standard, to see if she would be found worthy to become the future Marquise of Leith, and she found herself growing hot and cold by turns, whenever she thought of the approaching ordeal.

"Will, there is only one course for me to pursue," she said, with a long drawn sigh, on the evening previous to the day set for her visit, when she found her dread increasing, "I can only be myself and let her judge me as she will."

The next morning dawned fair and lovely, and Will appeared at the appointed hour to escort her to Leith.

He had himself been a trifle anxious regarding the personal appearance of his dear one, when he should take her to his elegant home, where his stately grandmother presided always clad in richest material; but delicacy had debarred him from making any suggestions and forbidden his offering financial aid, although he had yearned to do so, knowing, as he did, that the resources of the Westons were very limited.

But when Alice appeared before him clad for her journey in a dark blue serge, almost severe in its simplicity, but fitting her exquisitely and looking as if it had just come from the hands of a tailor—although he well knew every stitch had been set under her own supervision, he was satisfied that he had nothing to fear.

He had come for her as became a Lord of Leith, with an elegant equipage and attended by both driver and groom in livery, and their ride to Marchmont Court, behind a spanking pair of bays, was thoroughly enjoyed by the happy lovers. Her ladyship was certainly very wise and clever in her efforts to gain a strong influence over her grandson, and seemed to know exactly how to please him most; for, upon their arrival, she waived all ceremony and met them in the great hall with a sweet graciousness that at once set both lovers at ease.

But the keen eyes of the woman of the world were by no means idle; they took in at a glance the delicate beauty of the youthful face of Will's betrothed, the perfect form and the grace that comes only by careful training and the lack of self-consciousness, together with the exquisite nicety and tastefulness of her apparel.

"My dear," she said, as she released the slim, perfectly gloved hand after greeting her, "you have had a long drive, and I am sure you would like to refresh yourself before dinner, so I am going to send you directly to your room. Nellie," beckoning to a white-capped, white-aproned maid who was waiting in the background, "take Miss Weston to her apartments, and," she added, smiling kindly into the fair face, "you need not hurry, for I have ordered dinner served at seven, half an hour later than usual, for this evening."

Alice thanked her and followed the pretty maid up the grand flight of stairs, along a wide and lofty hall, and her eyes lighted with pleasure when the girl threw open a door, revealing a lovely suite of rooms, all uniformly hung and furnished in pale blue and white, with here and there a dash of gold.

There were sitting-room, chamber, dressing-room and a private bath, the latter finished in pure white marble.

"Shall I wait and help you, miss?" questioned the girl, respectfully, as she placed her bag upon a chair.

"Thank you," Alice replied, as composedly as if she had always been accustomed to a maid, while she deliberately drew off her gloves, "I shall not need you just at present, but"—glancing at an electric button which her quick eye had espied—"I will ring if I require anything later."

The girl retired with a lingering glance at the lovely face of the stranger, while the gracious sweetness with which she had thanked her was like a strain of music in her memory as she went away to other duties.

Three quarters of an hour later, when Alice appeared in the drawing-room, fresh and rosy from her bath and clad in a simple white gown, with only a Catherine Mermet rose—a vase of which she had found in her room—in her belt, Lady Marchmont could scarcely refrain from giving utterance to a cry of pleasure as her glance fell upon her.

The girl's dress was inexpensive, but fine and sheer and beautifully made, with tucks and ruffles of the material, and she looked a lady from the massive knot of gold that crowned her well-shaped head to the toes of the small bronze slippers which peeped in and out beneath her immaculate skirts.

"Very, very sweet, I must admit," was her ladyship's mental comment, "and she seems as unconscious of her luxurious surroundings as if she had always been accustomed to them."

This latter fact was a trifle disappointing to her, for she had expected to detect a wide-eyed glance of wonder, or curiosity, or an air of constraint which would betray embarrassment or unfamiliarity with the elegance into which she had been transplanted.

But no, Alice came directly to her with a free, even step, and smilingly responded to her greeting without a trace of self-consciousness or of confusion.

"But we will soon test her table etiquette—that always proves what the home training has been," mused her ladyship, while she conversed easily and pleasantly with her young guest until dinner was announced, when she led the way to the dining-room.

The table had been laid in the great bow window, which was so constructed that it could be turned into a breezy, semi-outdoor dining parlor during the summer.

Here the trio passed a charming hour, for Will exerted himself to draw both his grandmother and his betrothed out upon congenial topics, and the result was a most social repast, while Lady Marchmont did not once detect the slightest sign of awkwardness or breach of table formalities on the part of her guest, although not a movement escaped her keen eyes.

After dinner they repaired to a veranda on the west side of the mansion, where they chatted until long after a lovely new moon had disappeared below the horizon. Then they retired for the night, two, at least, of the party feeling supremely content with their lot in life.

The following morning was spent driving about the country, visiting various points of interest; the afternoon was passed under a wide-spreading tree, Alice working upon some dainty article that was to grace her sister's costume at the coming ball; Lady Marchmont reclining in a great willow rocker and curiously watching the girl's white, skilful fingers and her fair, earnest face, while Will read to them from the "Idylls of the King."

Subsequent days slipped by in much the same manner, every one proving Alice to be the veritable little lady which her lover had claimed that she was, and with whom the proud mistress of Leith could find no word of fault.

She was dignity without a touch of prudishness; she was bright and animated without being forward; sweet-tempered and ingenuous, but fearless in the expression of her opinions and convictions when occasion required.

Thus it is not strange that Lady Marchmont found herself becoming very fond of her and more than once mentally admitted that she would make a very congenial and lovable companion during the declining years of her life.

During the arrangements that were being made for the fete she also proved herself very efficient, suggesting, upon several occasions, certain changes which added greatly to the effect of decorations, adding new features which showed taste and inventive genius and making herself practically useful in many other ways.

On the morning preceding the day of the fete the family from Castleview arrived according to invitation, and both Imogen and Olive were very much taken back upon finding Alice there and learning—as they did from a servant—that she had been a visitor at the court for a week.

They greeted her frigidly, and then, after one astonished look, ignored her entirely.

Lady Marchmont was quietly observant of this, and realized at once the exact condition of affairs.

"Ah!" she thought, "we shall now have an interesting study in human nature. Miss Fletcher is in love with my grandson, ditto Miss Weston; now there cannot fail to follow certain conditions which will test the moral caliber of these fair rivals and bring either the best or the worst there is in them to the surface."

"Olive, what on earth is the meaning of that Weston girl's presence here?" Imogen demanded, the moment they were alone in their rooms.

The girl's proud lips curled; but her heart was like a seething volcano.

She had never hinted to anyone the discovery

HAPPY NEW YEAR! Glad to be able to meet you in this corner once more. Though this world to an interested observer on an adjoining planet, must if his eyesight is good, look like forty blazing hells rolled into one, I'm not in the least bit discouraged. If militarism is crushed in this war and it must be at all costs, the world will be swept with a wave of democracy and progress the like of which has never before been seen. War is the penalty people pay for the luxury of being dull, stupid and ignorant, and ignorance is the one thing humanity clings to lovingly and tenaciously. People were swept off the earth by disease and pestilence because they loved dirt and filth and wouldn't clean up. Pestilence carried off the rich and powerful as well as the poor and so the rich and powerful in order to protect themselves made laws that compelled people to clean up. Now we should have laws to compel people to clean the cobwebs from off their minds in order to make them think right and vote right—but we won't get any laws of that kind because ignorant people are useful while thinking people are dangerous; dangerous to kings, oppressors and exploiters. But doesn't education make people think Uncle Charlie? Yes, my dears, real genuine education for life makes people think right, but the smattering of education that is given in our schools today doesn't lead to real or active thought, any more than tickling the surface of the soil will produce good crops. You've got to fertilize the soil and plow deep to get good crops and then you must have proper weather conditions to secure the best results. It's the same with the brain. To get results you've got to probe deep down with the plow of knowledge, fertilize with ambition, love, kindness and high ideals and develop the whole in an atmosphere of culture and refinement. Do that (and it is the easiest thing in the world to do it) and you'll get really and truly humans, noble men and noble women, capable of noble thoughts and noble deeds, and war, carnage, poverty and misery will flee away as bats flee before the sunlight. Anyway remember this, we are living in the greatest period of the world's history, and comparatively few people in the United States unless they have relatives engaged in the bloody racial and dynastic struggle now taking place in Europe, are displaying much interest in what is going on. Most of the people I talk to inform me that it does not interest them much who wins, and as you look over their shoulders you see they are scanning the football and sporting page of the paper, or are gulping down the details of a murder trial. I get so disgusted with these boneheads, I want to hammer their koko's against the wall. My assistants being thoroughly alive, turn away in disgust, and we feel that it might probably be the greatest blessing that could strike this country if a few sixteen-inch shells were dropped in our coast cities, and if they did, what would be the result? The people of Chicago and St. Louis would laugh and say: "Gee it's time those New Yorkers got soaked anyway. One good thing the enemy is too far off to hurt us so what's the odds." What is back of all this indifference? I will once more tell you. Ignorance and its twin brother Selfishness. Presently I will tell you why we are ignorant but here's a little incident that happened the other day that impressed me very deeply, and which explains in a most heart-breaking way why we continue to wallow in the mire and why progress is so slow. A highly educated man, a professional man at that, and from his letter head I judge a man of means, wrote me that he was intensely interested in my talks in this department. What amazed him was the amount of information I always seemed to have at my finger ends. Where did I get all the astounding facts and figures I monthly present to you? He could not find them in any paper or books, he read, and he read a good many, and would I tell him from what sources the abundant information I possessed had been gathered. Could I direct him to the well-springs of my knowledge, the mine of my facts. He was willing to pay any price for books that would enable him to have as deep an insight into the workings of our social and industrial system as I seemed to have. He begged urgently for an immediate reply, so I went to the trouble of writing the gentleman as he was in such deadly earnest, and told him if he would send me the cost of two books that were lying on my bed (a sum less than a dollar) I would send them to him and get others to replace them. That is some months ago. The gentleman didn't reply. I didn't expect he would, for I don't believe in all America there are more than a handful of men who seriously want to know all they ought to know about their country, not even if you could give them all the knowledge they need for a few cents. That little incident left a painful impression behind, as the boy said when he had been hammered in the region of his coat tails, by his father. By the way I was talking to a bright girl this morning and mentioned the Suez Canal. She had never heard of it and of course didn't know where it was. I was questioning two boys the other day as to how President Garfield died. One said he was shot, the other, with a look of disgust on his face at his companion's ignorance said: "G'wan, he wasn't shot he was run over by an automobile." Now let me tell you as I promised to do why we are so ignorant.

We are supposed to have the best public school system in the world, and the best public schools, whereas we have the worst, as regards efficiency and results. Our public school system is the rankest failure the world has ever seen. It is the finest machine for turning out inefficient boneheads that was ever invented. For producing incompetence it is a howling success, for any other purpose it is a dismal failure. The people of America have invested in their educational plant $1,221,695,730, and it costs us nearly half a billion dollars yearly, or to be exact $446,726,929, to keep going a contraption that ought to be scrapped and fired on the dump. Out of every hundred children who go to our public schools, only seven pass through and acquire such knowledge as the schools have to offer. Only seven out of a hundred—do you get that? There are over two million children entering our public schools yearly. Only half a milion of these reach the high school and only 155,656 get into the fourth year. If only seven children out of a hundred (and most of these are girls by the way) graduate from high school, instead of the hundred per cent that ought to graduate, our school system is more than ninety per cent failure. In the elementary grades only a third of the children finish this portion of their education, and not one half of them finish the sixth grade. If you were to put a newspaper in the hands of any of these children they would hardly know if it were downside up or upside down, and if they tried to read it they would stumble over every fourth word. Sending these half baked children out into the world to battle for a living represents, it is computed an economic loss to the country of $250,000,000. Losing fifty per cent of the children in the middle of the elementary course accounts for about ninety per cent of all our national ills, for veneered ignorance is at the root of all evil.

I've told you about the children, now what about the teachers? We have about half a million teachers in the United States and only one in five of these can pass muster as thoroughly trained. In one of our best states from an educational point of view, only half the teachers have even been through high school. Isn't it lovely of those who have this education business in hand to assign a bunch of mentally half baked people who know little more than their scholars, to do the teaching? It costs $34.71 a year for each child's education and about thirty dollars of that money is wasted. The laws as to attendance differ widely in our various states. Some states compel children to go to school for forty weeks yearly, while some states having no compulsory attendance, don't care whether or not children go for forty minutes. Here our education is what is called cultural. It has nothing to do with the realities of life. Instead of being practical it is unpractical. It trains the mind a little, but the hand not at all, so the high school graduates drift into the already overcrowded professions or into underpaid office and clerical work instead of into craft and trade. Such manual training schools as we have, have failed to achieve anything worth while. Instead of sending boys to the shop they have handed them over to already overcrowded engineering colleges. Domestic science courses alas, are rare. Girls have a smattering of useless algebra and Latin but no knowledge of food values and no ability to cook and usually no desire either. What we want in the school is practical training for real life. We want a nation of skilled craftsmen and craftswomen instead of a nation of crafty men and dependent women.

Germany sent some of her greatest experts over here to study our school system. They were tipped off not to take us too seriously as they knew beforehand that from a German standard of efficiency we were a joke. And a joke they found us. They reported that they found here a feeling of complacent satisfaction with everything American. That complacent satisfaction by the way is our curse. The Germans reported that we had wonderful resources great geographical advantages, but our educational methods were so rank and did so little to help our industrial and economic development, that these drawbacks overcame any other advantages we might possess. These facts explain why it is that we have lawyers and doctors, who in other countries (where the standards professional men must attain are severely high) would be splitting rails or driving trucks. This is why half the physicians who send me medical certificates when vouching for our shut-ins usually spell invalid "i-n-v-a-l-a-d-e" and give evidence of other alarming symptoms of illiteracy. This too explains why we have men chopping wood who ought to be in the pulpit, and men in the pulpit making a bluff at preaching who ought to be chopping wood. The uneducated square peg will always have the nerve and effrontery to put its impudent nose into an educated round hole. A nation of semi-illiterate or rather semi-literate misfits, is bound to produce as we do so abundantly, a frightful crop of fakes, charlatans, and impostors, industrial squirrels and political thugs with the result that we have to tolerate a social system that has pikers at the top and suckers at the bottom. What we need is a central educational authority located in Washington. Uncle Sam should take over the education of his children, then education can be systematized and standardized. Inefficient teachers will be sent to washing dishes or splitting rails, and the youth of our land will be able to grow up and develop mentally and physically along lines that will make them a help and inspiration to our country, instead of a curse as so many of them are now thanks to the blight of ignorance and poverty, lack of education has forced upon them.

If you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's three wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Begin the New Year right by starting in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers. All can be had free as premiums; the Book of Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers for a club of only two subscriptions. See full particulars at the end of this department. These three books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and will make the new year a happy one.

Now for the letters:

OWINGSVILLE, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Have recently received and read your story book, and enjoyed it very much.

Have long been one of your admirers but felt that you had so much to do I would not worry you with a birthday letter. Have often thought of sending you and the girls a box of home-made candy, but like "Lilly," in your story book, thought you would be afraid of germs. Ha! Ha! I think I am real clean and careful about most everything and have a husband who is a physician and who is almost cranky about germs. So I am very healthy, and so is he. I weigh one hundred and four pounds and he two hundred and twenty. You don't think doctor has had many germs do you? You certainly are doing a great work, and I think Maria and Billy deserve a lot of credit also, but you the most. With lots of good wishes, for you,

I am sincerely. MRS. A. W. JONES.

Delighted to hear from you Mrs. Jones. You are quite right I am a crank when it comes to germs, and if everyone in the country had the germ business down as I have, there would be less disease in the land, fewer fine men, lovely women and precious children "resting" in lonesome cemeteries. About every third letter I take up reads something like this: "Dear Uncle Charlie: As I am just recovering from scarlet fever and have nothing to do I will write you a letter. There used to be seven of us in the family, but one brother and one sister died of typhoid, and last winter my baby brother had diphtheria and we never thought he'd live. Both father and mother are very much crippled with rheumatism. We have not been able to raise much of a crop here on acount of sickness. Your loving nephew, etc." For a slight variation the other letters will add consumption, pellagra, hookworm and occasionally smallpox. About a year ago I received a letter that ran like this: "Dear Uncle Charlie: I will have to close my letter in a hurry as I am feeling very ill. I am all out in a red rash. The doctor has just been and says it is scarlet fever. I thought I had better let you know as in case I died you would know what had become of me. Yours etc." That letter managed to get all around my bed-clothes, as it came to my home address, and I did not place a newspaper over my spread as I usually do when several hundred letters are dumped on it, from the big box that comes to me at regular intervals with your missives from Augusta. Well, that scarlet fever letter meant the burning of all my other mail, the burning too of an elderdown spread, a white suit of pajamas and a few other highly essential and valuable articles, costing in all over twenty dollars. Then I went into quarantine for several days while the house reeked with the odor of disinfectants. I was taking no chances. A few days later a letter arrived from the scarlet fever party. Maria's eagle eye detected it by the handwriting and postmark, and so that we should not have to take the trouble of burning down the house in order to disinfect it, Maria took the letter into the cellar, saturated it with disinfectants, and though the carbolic had made it somewhat illegible, she managed to decipher this much: "Dear Uncle Charlie: You see I ain't dead yet. That wasn't no scarlet fever. It was only hives, so I am still alive. Hoping you are the same, I am, Your loving friend, Will Edwards." Now maybe you'll think that's all a fairy story, but every word of it is Gospel truth. This time the laugh is on me. Enjoy it to your heart's content. Letters, however, are great carriers of contagion and infection, and no one should write a letter when there is a contagious disease in the house. Man has killed off nearly all the big animals that threatened his existence on this planet. Now he has to battle with billions of unseen and far more dangerous foes. People are scared of an elephant, a big, but harmless animal on the whole, and would run in fear if he came in their direction. On the other hand flies, which are a thousand times more deadly than elephants, tigers or lions, are allowed to roam millions of homes in swarms. We are surrounded by billions of disease germs which find entrance into our systems through the mouth or nose but chiefly through the mouth. One of the filthiest and most dangerous habits indulged in by nearly all human beings, a habit which is responsible for seventy-five per cent of all diseases, is that of putting the fingers on the lips and in the mouth. To see a man counting filthy, dirty, germ-laden bills (the majority of which, some time or other, have been carried in stockings of people suffering from the vilest diseases), wetting the while his fingers with saliva from his mouth so as to make the counting surer, transferring the germs from each bill to his system, is a sight to make a sick hog weep. Never put your fingers on your lips or in your mouth except you first wash and sterilize them with some strong germicide such as carbolic. Rubbing your fingers all over your mouth is nothing but a habit, a very dirty and dangerous habit, one that can be broken with very little effort. I would no more think of putting my fingers on my lips or in my mouth, than I would think of jumping out of the window. The high death rate among children is due to the fact that they are constantly conveying germs from the filthy objects they handle (especially the germs on dogs and cats) into their mouths. I know a girl of twenty-two who sucks her thumb as persistently as she did when she was a baby, and oh, the filth and dirt I've seen go into that pretty mouth. There is nothing in the world that mops up the germs as do gloves. Kid gloves quickly become caked with filth and dirt and yet every woman who sits down in an armchair will after a moment or two, begin rubbing her filthy gloves across her lips. It's just habit, she does not realize she is doing it. If she is holding a pocketbook which is also encrusted with a million germs in her hand, she will rub the end of it against her lips and probably in moments of distraction she will bite the ends of it. People with consumption have frequently visited me. They generally sit in a red leather chair which is pushed up to my bedside. They hold a handkerchief and cough into it, and then rest the handkerchief on the arm of the chair, smothering the leather with bacilli. Later on that chair is used at mealtime by one of my help who in the intervals of eating rests her hands where the germs would be if we had not sterilized the chair. Bread and cake are always passed to the mouth by the hand, with the result that everything that is on the hand adheres to the bread and goes into the system. Those who handle my food have first to wash and sterilize their hands, and I transfer it to my mouth with a knife and fork, the only sanitary and sensible way to do. Some people do not change their table-cloths for a whole week and by that time they are smothered with disease germs and upon these filthy table-cloths they put their bread. The handles of doors are always caked with germs. Suppose you ask a person for an extra slice of bread, the supply on the table having been demolished on her way to the kitchen the one who is attending to your wants will probably open two doors, smothering her hands with germs and then handle your bread. Newspapers are thrown into the areaways of houses where filthy cats have deposited their diphtheria germs, and then taken and placed on the breakfast table. If you realized how much disease there is in the world and how few really healthy people there are you would be astounded. The black plague as well as the white plague is everywhere. If you only knew about your neighbors what the doctor knows you would throw up your hands. People who are infected with disease as a rule are utterly indifferent as to whether or not they infect others. Friends come to visit you and they have taken the liberty of bringing another friend who is most anxious to meet you. The friend is a gentleman whose face is a mass of irruption. His handkerchief is constantly being transferred from his pocket to his face. It is dinner-time. They still linger and you of course invite them to stay. The gentleman with the suspicious face insists on doing the carving, forgets to turn his head when he sneezes, and if you don't command him to sit down he will later on be out in the kitchen helping to wash up the dishes. I've had all our dishes boiled more than once on account of easily detected signs of a terrible disease. I have at times wanted to boil one of my male guests. It was the only way of sterilizing him and protecting ourselves. When ignorance is bliss it's folly to be wise, so the great poet says, but when we are menaced by germs that are more deadly than machine guns (and many of us run this risk daily) we are only putting in practise the first law of nature—self preservation—to protect one's self from those unseen foes which will, if one's system is run down, and sometimes if it is not run down, put one in the grave before one knows it. All humanity should wage war on germs. As a first step screen your house and keep the flies out, and for God's sake don't let your children have cats and dogs to play with. Keep these animals out of the house. If you want a real pet get a canary. The bird will do what most human beings have an objection to doing, take a bath every morning. That is a lesson in cleanliness for all of you. Keep your fingers out of your mouth and away from your lips. It is no use washing your hands before you go to the table, if when seating yourself you draw your chair (a chair impregnated with dirt) up to the family board with your hands. The man who sat in that chair before you, possibly had the black plague. Push your chair to the table with the back of your hand and then slide into it. Don't use use any cups that have cracks in them. They are the abiding places of millions of germs. Abolish the round towel and the common drinking cup, the greatest spreaders of disease known next to the house fly. Never drink water or milk unless they have been boiled. Never put ice in water. Put your water after boiling, in milk or beer bottle and place them in the ice box or some other cool place. Milk should be treated the same way. The tens of thousands who die from typhoid in this country yearly, would all be alive if they had taken the trouble to keep the flies out of their houses and boiled the milk and water they drank. Now paste this article away in your scrap books and get the teacher to read it to the children in school, and there will be more healthy, happy people and less work for the undertaker. You will say grandfather and grandmother did very well, and they knew nothing of germs. Yes, but grandfather and grandmother had typhoid, and they saw their children die like flies, and they only survived, because their constitutions happened to be so strong that they were sometimes able to combat nine tenths of all the germs that got into their systems. If nature didn't fight for us as well as against us the race would soon die out. Science however is teaching us how to help nature and thus how to avoid suffering and death. I'm speaking on behalf of science. Heed my words.

LEAD, S. DAK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am five feet five inches short, and weigh (oh, I do hate to tell), one hundred and six pounds. Now am I not a terrible featherweight? Let me take a seat on the edge of your bed uncle and I bet ten to one you will land on the floor. It's awful to be so fat. Don't you think so? You will think I am related to the fat lady Maria had to help up-stairs in "Lily, or Help Wanted." I certainly thought I would explode when I read that story of yours. I do not think I ever read anything in my life that was so comical. I would read a while and the children would say: "Mamma, whatever are you laughing at, have you gone crazy over Uncle Charlie's Story Book?" and "How Uncle Charlie became a Hero of the Spanish American War," is another story that struck me forcibly, it is funny and sad and all around a grand story.

Uncle, although I am twenty-seven years young I do not believe I'll ever grow up. My worst half is always telling me how kiddish I am. I hate to be stiff and prim like some people I've seen, who would not laugh for love or money.

We live here where the famous Homestake Gold Mine is, right in the heart of the Black Hills. It is certainly great to go through the hoists and mills and see the way the ore is handled, crushed, milled and washed, before it is made into gold bricks. The hoists here go down nineteen hundred feet into the ground and they have one thousand miles of track under ground and I think about five hundred motors which are all run by compressed air. This is the largest gold mine in the world, but I assure you Uncle we poor trash don't get rich from it by a whole lot. Living is so high here, it costs a fortune to live here.

We are just one mile above the sea here and I don't think the big sea water will ever get us, or wash us away.

Not far from here is the Crow Indian reservation, also the Black Hawk. I have taken COMFORT ever since I can remember and of all the papers I take I like COMFORT the best.

Your loving friend, MRS. EDYTH CROSSMAN.

Thank you for your jolly and newsy letter. It is a wonder that one who can see the funny side of life as you do should be so toothpicky. There is one advantage however, in being as stout as you are. If you ever come to New York and visit me we could take you into our kitchen without amputating your arms, or without you having to go sideways. Glad the contents of my story book gave you so much fun. You say, "I don't believe I'll ever grow up." If you weigh one hundred and seven pounds and are five feet five, I heartily agree with you that you shouldn't grow up. I suggest you try to grow sideways. Now I'll be good. I never try to have any fun at the expense of my grown-up correspondents. It's only the young folks that I jolly and then always for their own good. You, however, are so good natured, and like myself so full of the kid spirit, utterly declining to do anything so absurd as to grow old, dignified and ossified, that I know you won't exact any apology for anything I have said. It must be exceedingly interesting to go through those gold mines where they make the gold

Sally Sunshine, Optimist

By Lillian Grace Copp

Read this inspiring story; then make a New Year resolution to be an optimist. Each morning, through the year, on awakening remember Sally Sunshine and renew your resolution to be an OPTIMIST.

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AUNT MARIA closed the oven door with a decided bang; then wiping her floury hands on a corner of her apron turned to her sister with a grimace of disgust.

"John might have left a life insurance," she fumed. "What did he think would become of Sally? I have all I can do to provide for my own. I should think, Hannah——" She paused significantly, as she sought the consolation of her stout little rocker.

"You are mistaken if you think I am going to handicap myself with a crippled invalid," retorted Aunt Hannah. "Jim and I decided that the day John was buried."

Maria gave an ominous hitch to her chair. The hot blood stained her cheeks unbecomingly.

"Sally can't stay in Boston alone. Even if she is twenty-two, in her condition she is as helpless as a child. It isn't as if you and Jim couldn't afford to care for her, your own brother's child."

"It's no use to take that tone, Maria," settled Aunt Hannah, firmly. "John was as much your brother as mine; but when we get right down to facts neither one of us is under any obligation to care for Sally. I told John she should be taught to sew in order to learn a trade instead of playing at housekeeping in their two back rooms, and wasting hours over a book by the window. But he wouldn't listen to a word. Now all I have to say is, he had better have profited by my advice."

Aunt Maria got up very quickly. A loose board squeaked a quick protest as she crossed to the oven. She whirled the pies with a force that threatened to turn them upside down.

"With John's poor health and Sally's expenses I suppose he did have all that he could do to eke out an existence, but he might have known it would be just his luck to go in a flash with Sally unprovided for. Something must be done, Hannah. I'd hate to have people say my own niece was being supported by charity."

"Then keep her with you," was her sister's cool suggestion.

"I think I did my part when I had John brought here, and you all down for the funeral."

Whatever Aunt Maria might have added to her grievance was cut short by the door opening to admit a frail, ashen-faced girl, walking painfully. The wind, cool and sweet with verbenas and late-blooming roses, rushed into the heated kitchen and over the glowing range.

"Close the door quickly, Sally," fretted Aunt Maria. "There, you have let the cat in! I never allow him in the house. Here, Tommy, Tommy!" Maria made a futile catch for the cat. Sally laughed softly as the cat evaded his mistress' ponderous rush and escaped through the opened door.

"Oh, Sally! how can you? And your father dead less than a week!" cried both aunts in unison.

"Father wouldn't be happy in heaven, if he knew I should never laugh again," breathed Sally. "We always found something to laugh over."

"You will have hard work to find anything to laugh over now, I am thinking," frowned Aunt Maria. "I can't keep you here, and Hannah says that you can't stay with her."

Sally limped over to a chair, and moving it a little to the right that she might face both, answered calmly:

"I have never expected to stay with either of you. I am going home this afternoon as we planned——"

"But, Sally," interposed Aunt Maria, "you can't keep even two back rooms without money, and there is scarcely enough left to pay your expenses back to Boston."

"I know and that is why I am going to work."

"You work? What can you do? You can't sew, nor cook, nor go in a shop, nor——" Aunt Maria paused for the want of a suitable word.

"Nor you haven't a talent in the world," her sister hurried to her rescue.

"Oh, Aunties, is it really as bad as that?" Sally was half-amused, half-hurt at the hopelessness their tones depicted.

"If you had as much sense as a child, you would know it was worse than that," scolded Aunt Maria. What plans have you got in that silly little head of yours?"

"Only one, Auntie, and I think that I won't tell it to you, at least, not just yet." Then her sudden brave show of independence deserted her. "If you and Aunt Hannah will love me only a little, that is all I will ask. It is so hard to feel that no one cares!" She stretched out two thin arms with a half-pleading gesture.

Tears misted Aunt Hannah's eyes as she met Sally's vitally glowing ones. "If Jim weren't so determined, Sally," she offered, "I would help. But he never liked you."

"Dependence would be a burden, Auntie. The two rooms where dear father and I lived are the only place in the world where I have a right to be. I shall get on."

The girl turned her face toward the window. After two unsuccessful attempts she regained her feet. At the door she paused to address the waiting women: "Please don't wait lunch for me, auntie, but I shall be ready for the 2.10 train."

Late in October Aunt Hannah alighted from a car at the corner of an obscure street. It was three months since she had seen Sally placed in a cab at the North Station, and given explicit directions that the girl be left at the correct number. She didn't just know how the time had slipped away so rapidly without her making that promised call. But a letter forwarded by Maria the night before, in which Sally had written that she was soon to change her address, and, for a few days, would be at Commonwealth Avenue, had sent Hannah puzzled and impatient into Boston that Sally might interpret the letter.

At the entrance Aunt Hannah stopped short. There on the corner of the house hung a neatly lettered sign:

"LESSONS IN SMILES GIVEN HERE. PRICES REASONABLE. All who are sick, discouraged, disappointed, or discontented, call on Sally Sunshine, Optimist, and learn the secret of unfailing good cheer."

Aunt Hannah caught her breath sharply. She felt as if personally disgraced. Who had ever heard of such audacity! Her quick ascent of the steps rendered her a bit breathless. She pulled the bell with an angry jerk and sent forth an impatient summons, which echoed her turbulent thoughts like a refrain. Sally should be made to stop this ridiculous farce at once. Of what was the girl thinking?

"You will have to wait your turn," announced the landlady, coldly, as she opened the door and recognized Sally's aunt. "You may sit here until Miss Sally can see you!"

She pushed open the door at the end of the hall, into what had formerly been Sally's kitchen, and which still held the couch that had been her father's bed. With the aid of a screen and several yards of cretonne the room was now converted into a comfortable reception-room. Aunt Hannah's glance swept the furnishings eagerly then rested curiously on the two occupants.

That tall, dark-complexioned woman with an unmistakable air of prestige looked strangely familiar. Aunt Hannah gave a sudden start as she recognized her as the distinguished Mrs. Van Anden, whose name and face so frequently graced the society page in the Sunday papers. And the woman was actually calling on Sally, when Aunt Hannah would have sacrificed much to have even a bowing acquaintance with one who held so exalted a position.

Through the closed door the soft tones of the girl's voice was scarcely distinguishable, yet Mrs. Van Anden heard and a smile chased away the lines about her somewhat discontented mouth. She instantly resumed her conversation with the other woman that Aunt Hannah's entrance had interrupted.

"Yes, it certainly is original, but she told me on my first call that 'To make the best of things' was her one talent, and she had to make it count. She has served a long, hard apprenticeship. Twenty-two years of pain is a severe test for one to pass through, and yet remain so sweet, and strong and wholesome that she has a surplus of cheer to pass on to others."

"But I don't understand. You see I never heard of her until an hour ago. Has she no relatives to care for her?" the other questioned eagerly.

"She has two aunts, I learned of them through the landlady. When Sally's father died they refused her all assistance. Just imagine what they must be to desert an almost helpless girl! I should feel contaminated to speak to either," Mrs. Van Anden's tones withered.

Aunt Hannah looked straight ahead. Only the twitching of a nerve in her left temple told how the words seared. A great wave of thankfulness swept over her that to Mrs. Van Anden she was only a chance caller.

"It looks as if I should need a post-graduate course," smiled Mrs. Van Anden, quickly, "but it actually makes me rabid to think of those two women. Our dear little sunshine teacher though is too sweet and busy to entertain bitter thoughts. I wonder if a life-time of pain would purify everyone the way it has her."

"No, not every one," sighed the other woman, and evidently a sorrowful memory stirred her. She threw it off quickly. "I am consumed with curiosity as to how you chanced to find this girl?" Her voice betrayed her great interest.

"It came about in the queerest way," returned Mrs. Van Anden. "The president of the flower mission ran short of flowers one day early in July, and called my secretary on the 'phone. Obeying an unaccountable impulse, I carried the flowers over myself. The president was so deeply interested in Sally's new venture that she talked of little else. When I left the mission I was saturated. I came over at once, and as it happened I was Sally's first applicant."

"And she really helped you?"

"Helped me? I haven't missed a single week since my first call. Discontent vanishes with the memory of that girl ever before me."

"What a pity that her aunts don't come in for a few lessons," laughed the other, as the soft tinkle of a bell announced that Sally was ready for another caller.

The hour that Sally gave to her two callers seemed interminable to Aunt Hannah waiting in the room where the only view from the window was a back yard fenced in by brick walls. A few weeds crept up on either side of the broken fence, and from the network of lines was suspended yards of new cloth in process of bleaching. The woman knew that the view from the larger room was the same, except the suffocating walls came closer. She hadn't remembered it was so bad. On her rare, brief calls during her brother's life, the rooms had been irradiated by Sally's presence. Suddenly Aunt Hannah realized what a wonderful personality the girl must have! She recalled Mrs. Van Anden's tone in speaking of the two aunts. Her head bowed on her hand and tears of mortification stung her smarting eyes. She had worked so hard and so futilely to gain a foothold in the circles where Sally's two callers moved. Was it too late?

Sweet and clear Sally's bell interrupted her aunt's bitter self-communion. With a medley of emotions Aunt Hannah arose and went through the narrow doorway.

Could that be Sally? White-faced and diminutive as ever she sat in her chair by the window, but a new, strange atmosphere of power enveloped her.

"Oh, Auntie, you have come at last!" The girl's glad, joyous greeting held an undertone of longing for the love and companionship that the tie of blood ever brings.

Though Aunt Hannah was really touched by Sally's welcome, the eager questions trembling on her tongue were too insistent to be long stilled. She hurried over the usual preliminaries and almost involuntarily slipped into the part of interrogator.

"But what do you say to them, Sally? How do you keep them interested?"

Obligingly Sally again took up the role of teacher.

"Just tell me your particular trouble, Auntie, and let us discover the smiles for they are surely there!"

To the girl's dismay her aunt covered her face with her hands.

"There isn't a single smile, Sally," she sobbed. "My trouble is just plain selfishness. I never saw it before, but I do now. All my life I have wanted the best, and then have spurned it when it was mine for the taking. When I think I could have had the comfort of having you with me all these weeks, if I hadn't thought——"

Sally winced sharply. She fully understood Aunt Hannah's sudden change of heart. In an instant, however, she conquered her brief shrinking.

"But your case isn't hopeless, Auntie, dear!" she exclaimed brightly, "for selfishness is at the root of nine tenths of all our troubles. I am sure that we can find loads of smiles and, even perhaps, a hearty laugh right here. Let us look!"

Aunt Hannah stared at her niece. This was a different Sally, and yet was she different? The woman had never before known just how much there was to the girl.

"Do you talk like that to them all, Sally?" she gasped.

A musical, rippling laugh good to hear broke from the girl's lips. It reminded one of running water slipping over wet stones.

"When you taught music, Auntie," she asked a bit irrelevantly, "did you use the same words to initiate Johnny Stupid into the intricacies of the art that you used with Ruth Bright?

"Now, I am going to be plain, Auntie, for I know only too well to what you refer. Suppose you had taken me into your home when dear father died. We had scarcely a thought in common. You would have been miserable, for to you it would have been a painful duty. To me, the burden of dependence without love from the benefactor, would have been intolerable.

"As it has been, I have learned more of self-reliance and of trust in an unfailing Providence, than all the years have before taught me. You have had a summer full of delightful little trips, that would have been impossible had I been with you." She paused and her glance wandered admiringly over her aunt's modish costume. "You have taken more pleasure in your wardrobe, for you have had more to spend, and you haven't had, forgive me, Auntie, to acknowledge as your niece one of whom you have ever been ashamed."

"Stop, Sally, there isn't a single thing there that is good!"

"Yes, Auntie, there has worked out much that was good for both."

"But had I known, what I know now, Sally," wailed Aunt Hannah.

The girl reached and took one of her aunt's plump hands in hers. There was power in Sally's slender palms that forced its consciousness upon the woman.

"Remember, Auntie, dear, the surgeon cuts deep to remove the growth which threatens the life of his patient. Just think of me in the light of the surgeon. I want to help you, and if I hurt it is only that good may come.

"It is only on account of Mrs. Van Anden and her friends that you regret not offering me a home. But, Auntie, I should never have known Mrs. Van Anden had I gone home with you three months ago. God sent her to me in my great need. The day she came I hadn't tasted food for two days. The relief was so great when she paid me five dollars for her first call that I fainted. She thought it was over excitement at our long talk for she was here nearly two hours. Last week I told her the real cause of that fainting spell."

"Oh, Sally," reproached Aunt Hannah, "how could you!"

"Don't worry, Auntie, she didn't misunderstand. I told it to illustrate a point I was making. I couldn't bear to see her faith growing even the tiniest speck dim. Poor people are not the only ones who have problems to solve, Auntie, dear.

"How I love the memory of this summer! It has taught me wonderful things. When father died I just had to fight every step of the way, then I came home." Sally's glance wandered lovingly over the room that had been home to her for so many years. "Yes, it is home; no other place will ever seem just like it," she said, with assurance, then she paused: "It was then I decided that death, invalidism and poverty were just the three hardest things in the world. I know better now, Auntie. I have learned that the rich are sometimes crucified daily, while to the world they present an exterior that commands only envy. And yet I believe pain in any form is sent for our advancement. It is we in our blindness who embrace sighs instead of smiles."

"How wise you have grown, Sally," commented her aunt, thoughtfully, "you were always such an ignorant little thing."

A bewitching smile disclosed the suggestion of a dimple in Sally's cheek at the intended compliment, but instantly her face sobered.

"Father and I always talked of the deep things of life. Oh, Auntie, if I could make people see the good, the way father taught it to me." Sally stopped abruptly.

"And I never dreamed that John was a philosopher. You will have so much to teach me, Sally, but you will find me a willing pupil. I'll make up to you for all you have undergone since John's death. How soon can you come to us, Sally?"

"But, Auntie, I don't understand!"

"Why, you are coming to live with me, now. I thought you knew. I decided that this afternoon. You won't need to teach 'Smiles' any more, though, of course, your friends can come to see you the same as they do now."

Sally hesitated. She didn't want to hurt her aunt, but, after all, she decided, it would be a bit of a shock in whatever words it was expressed. Perhaps, it would be as well to get it over at once. She leaned over. Her warm hands on Aunt Hannah's arm robbed the words of much of their abruptness:

"Your offer is too late, Auntie. I go to live with Mrs. Van Anden next week, and we leave for a several years' residence in Europe the following Saturday."

bricks. People who want to see gold bricks should not go to the Black Hills. The finest gold brick factory in the United States is in Washington, D. C. The great difference between the gold brick factory in Washington and the one in the Black Hills is that the people in Washington get $7,500 a year for making useless gold bricks, while the average wage of the miners (and I take this from the 13th census of the United States "Mines and Quarries," 1910, page 21) who make the real gold bricks, is only $551.82 yearly, an average wage of $11 a week, and with the murderously high cost of commodities in the Rocky Mountain region and the plains leading up to it, I don't wonder, Mrs. Crossman, that you are not growing fat. Don't feel blue, however, for there are more than a million miners risking their lives for the same miserable remuneration. I'm glad you get some comfort out of the fact that you are a mile above sea level. If I were a miner and had to spend my life underground (and you can't be a miner very well unless you do) and got the usual tough deal that is handed the miners in America, who facing death daily deep in the bowels of the earth for next to nothing a week, I don't think I should congratulate myself that I was so far away from the sea, but on the contrary I think I would get so close to the sea that the first good husky wave that came along would blot me out of existence forever. Never mind, Mrs. Crossman, there's a better day coming when there will be more money in the gold-brick business for you and yours, and a little less for those other gentlemen who have no worries about the high cost of living as you have.

NEWARK, Mo.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you let me come in and have a chat with you? I have never seen a letter from a southwest girl before. I am five feet six inches tall, weigh one hundred and ten pounds. I am sixteen years old. I have one sister three brothers older than myself. I live on a lot of ten acres. I enjoy reading the cousins' letters.

My sister walks a mile to school. I have two cats and one dog. We have an apple orcher. Come down and help me next summer to eat apples. I work in the field. I have one cow. I like to milk and cook and bake bread. I like to sew house clean. I can do almost anything. I don't go to school any more. Uncle did you ever like to pick strawberries? I greatly enjoy horseback riding do you? I buy all of my close. Mother says that if I had a thousand dollars I would buy all shoes and not anything else.

With best wishes to you all.

MARY KATHERINE DENNIS.

Mary, I do not know whether you live in Missouri or Maryland. So many people give the o in Mo an upward stroke making it resemble a d, and this sends many letters astray. There is a Newark in Missouri, and a Newark in Maryland. People who live in these two commonwealths should write out the names of their states in full. The mail of these states will continue to be mixed and lost unless the addresses are typewritten or written very distinctly. You say you are a Southwest girl, that would indicate Missouri, but so many boys and girls know absolutely nothing of geography and don't know east from west, so that clue doesn't help much. If I gave a blank map in which all the states were indicated to five hundred school children not more than one in ten would be able to pick out his or her native state, and not one in five hundred could fill in all the names of the states correctly. Mary, you say you live on a lot of ten acres. Now if you told us you lived on a ten-acre lot we would have had no trouble in locating you, but a young lady who lives on "a lot of ten acres" must do a considerable amount of moving around. By the way you are mopping up the earth there won't be enough to go around. You say you have an apple "orchar." You might draw us a picture of that apple "orchar." I suppose it is some fruit-picking machine you use in your orchard. Of course there is a remote possibility that you may mean apple orchard. I hope southwest girls as a class have not as many bad spells as you have in your letter. Mary, I wouldn't mind coming down and eating apples with you, but I don't think I would ever have the courage to eat them in an "orchar." You say you like to milk cook and bake bread. Billy the Goat says if he could see you milking a loaf he would be willing to go without tin cans and a visit to the movies for the rest of his life. You also say you like to "sew house clean." It must be rather a tedious job to sew a house clean, but if you can get results you should worry. You also add: "I buy all my close." This is where the Goat is having a fit. Suppose you spell it clothes next time. If you spent all the money on shoes Mary, you would have nothing left for "close," or excuse me for clothes. If shoes are the only things you have in your wardrobe and the only attire you care to spend your money on, take my advice and —well just lock yourself in your wardrobe. A lady who had a mania for shoes might get along very well on a tropical island, but one needs a more diversified attire for the United States.

GLEN ALLEN, Mo.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you make room for a country girl and farmer's wife? Uncle, I enjoyed your talk this month so very much, not only this but all months, and as for the advice you give the cousins, I don't know who could give them better. Oh, how I do wish I could see you, and have a chat with you.

Dear girls, I hope you will heed Uncle's advice about marrying so young. You should at least wait until you get your full physical development any way. Heed also the advice about young men for when you make a mistake it is usually too late to undo it. Sometimes when people make these mistakes it awakens them to their senses. Supposed friends will condemn you, but God will not condemn you, if you did not sin willfully.

The girl is always blamed, while the boy can do anything without reproof or condemnation.

I often get lonesome, but when I get Uncle's poem book and begin to read, my loneliness disappears. I also like his songs and story book and think they are grand.

I am five feet three inches in height, have dark brown hair and light blue eyes. My mother died when I was fourteen years of age and three years later I was married to a good, hard-working man. I have two sweet little boys, and am now twenty-two years old.

With love and best wishes to you all, I am, your niece,

MRS. ADA ALDRICH.

I am always mighty glad when any of you single girls, or married girls give good, sound, sensible advice to your sisters and warn them of the many traps and pitfalls that rascally men and hardened female fiends (I won't call them women) are constantly setting for the youthful, innocent, unsophisticated members of your sex. The world is a pretty tough place for a man, but it is simply hell for women. We've got a world that looks like the real thing, and that's just what makes it dangerous. It looks civilized and decent and instead of that it is uncivilized and indecent. There is scarcely a thing in the world today that will stand an investigation. Pull up a stone in your garden where all around looks fair, and the flowers, God's smiles, are blooming, and under it you will find hundreds of loathsome little insects and all sorts of horrid, nasty, creepy, crawly things, blinded by the light that has been thrown upon tem, scurrying to cover, burrowing and delving into the dirt for security, terrorized by the rays of the sun that has betrayed their presence. That's what you may call lifting the lid. Nearly everything in this world today carries a lid. Lift the lid from our government, you know what you will find. Lift the lid from our great industrial corporations and see the shyster lawyers and fraudulent financiers beating it like chickens from a hovering hawk. Lift the lid from the minister and see how much of what he is preaching to you, he actually believes and actually practises. Lift the lid from the storekeeper and watch him handing you short weight and charging you high prices for inferior goods. And now girls it is up to you, lift the lid from the heart and mind of that young man you are meeting on the quiet without your parents knowing anything about it, and from all those men who if you are pretty, or even decently attractive, are sizing you up in their minds and wondering from your appearance, actions and bringing up whether there would be a chance to

On an Ocean Liner in Time of War

By Maria (Nellie Rutherford)

Copyright, 1914, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

EARLY this summer Uncle Charlie decided he would give me a holiday, so I made up my mind to take a trip to the land of my fathers, and on July 1st., sailed from New York on board the new palatial ocean giantess Aquitania of the Cunard Line, for a three months' visit to the British Isles, Billy the Goat and an assistant Goat taking care of Uncle Charlie during my absence.

The voyage was uneventful. The mighty vessel was so steady that she scarcely seemed to move. The weather was perfect, and when after a six-day voyage the big ship, with five thousand souls aboard, steamed up the Mersey river to Liverpool, we all felt somewhat sad to think our voyage was over.

My objective was a village in the south of Scotland, and I was fortunate enough to catch a train without any delay, and thanks to the long twilight was able to see a great deal of the country en route. After an eight-hour ride I reached the little village for which I was bound, a sleepy little town nestling in the bosom of the hills away from the main line of traffic. A community where luxury has not lulled the inhabitants into somnolent sloth, nor poverty gripped them with its iron hand; a village thoroughly satisfied with itself and inclined to view with pity anyone not so fortunate as to have been born within its boundaries. With its rows of little houses seeming to lean against each other for mutual support, and its beautiful surroundings, it presents a picture of old world loveliness, simplicity and restfulness that could scarcely be surpassed.

It was on July 8th, that I reached this charming spot, and here I spent a delightful three weeks with relatives who live two miles outside the village.

One Monday morning after I had been home for three weeks, just as I was preparing to go and spend the day with some friends, a telegraph messenger arrived with a cable from Uncle Charlie. I opened it hurriedly, fearing he might be ill, and that I must come home. Judge of my surprise when I read: "Come home immediately if war breaks out." I rubbed my eyes and read it again, turned to the messenger boy and asked if he were sure he had got the message right, or was there a possibility of war breaking out? The boy (an intelligent fellow of about sixteen) assured me there was no thought of war, that the Kaiser and King a few weeks previously had shaken hands and vowed eternal friendship. I searched through the newspapers, which in my desire for complete rest I had hitherto ignored, but could see nothing alarming. Somewhat reassured, but still mystified, I went off for the day, asking wherever I had an opportunity if there were war or rumors of war anywhere but was told that the idea of war was perfectly ridiculous. The next day I went up to the village to get newspapers. Walking in front of me was a man with a paper in his hand. I glanced over his shoulder and read: "Austria declares war on Servia." Then in a flash I knew what was going to happen and what had been agitating the watchful Uncle Charlie. We had discussed this very European question numberless times, and knew that trouble must come sooner or later. I scurried up to the news agent's store, got a paper, read all in it relating to the European crisis, cabled Uncle Charlie: "Must I come home?" and settled down to wait for his reply, which came the following day: "Secure earliest possible passage." Things began to move quickly after that. I telegraphed the Cunard line, and miraculously secured a berth on board the Laconia, sailing from Liverpool August 8th, succeeding where thousands who were storming the London offices had failed.

From this time on the change in that sleepy little village was extraordinary. The people seemed electrified, shocked into life. There was a rush for newspapers. Groups of men eagerly gathered on the street corners reading and discussing all the news, talking over the mobilizing of the fleet, the efforts of the government to preserve peace, or failing that to localize the conflict; the letter carrier on his daily rounds meanwhile taking the names of men willing to serve their country in case of war. Each day the reports in the papers became more ominous: "Germany declares war on Russia," "Germany invades Luxembourg," "Germany invades Belgium." Then this momentous headline appeared: "We send Ultimatum to Germany," and the following day: "We declare war." The die was cast, speculation and conjecture were over, the next thing was to prepare for the conflict, and when the call for men came, that little village was not found wanting, but sent of its best.

It was on August 5th, the day England declared war that I regretfully left the familiar scenes of happier days and journeyed south. The railroads had just been taken over by the government, troops were entraining and being hurried to mobilizing camps, passenger service being somewhat demoralized in consequence. Still in spite of the general upheaval things went on quietly as usual. There was no shouting, no bravado, no boasting. The whole nation seemed to realize that it was engaged in a life-and-death struggle, giving the impression of a people facing a great and unexpected crisis, facing it calmly and resolutely, determined to do their best.

I had to travel from Scotland down to the very south of England to see Uncle Charlie's sister, who has resided in England for a great many years, and whom he has not seen for a very long time.

I traveled down to London through a smiling English country, that resembled one vast, beautiful garden. It did not seem possible the nation could be at war, everything looked so restful and peaceful. At every station one passed however, signs of great military activity were apparent. There were soldiers in groups, soldiers in units; everywhere you saw them in their trim kahki uniforms, quiet, alert and businesslike. I was late in arriving at Euston Station, and from there took a taxicab to a hotel. I had a room overlooking the street, and all night long there was a continuous tramp, tramp, tramp of soldiers, the roll of gun carriages, sharp voices giving orders, etc., grim reminders that the business of war was on foot, and that the nation was getting ready to meet it.

There was not much sleep to be had, and I was not at all sorry when gray dawn came stealing in at my window, and it was time to dress. On going down to the dining-room, an amusing incident due to the war made itself evident. There were no waiters. Nearly all the London waiters are German, and they had been called home to fight for the Fatherland, and the proprietor had not had time to fill their places, consequently the guests had to wait on themselves or each other.

Breakfast over I taxied across London, caught a train, and after a short ride of two hours reached Hastings, that delightful and historic seaside city, almost within cannon shot from the French coast. I stayed overnight with Uncle Charlie's sister who was greatly worried at the possibility of having her home destroyed by bombs from airships. At night the lights of the French warships could be seen blinking out in the Channel, another grim reminder that the dove of peace had fled from Europe and the dogs of war had been unchained.

The following morning I left Hastings for London. London! How I had longed to visit that mighty city, and view its historic buildings, but alas, a glimpse of Westminster Abbey in the distance was all I was permitted to see. The traffic was so congested that my hurrying taxi had frequently to stop, and this enabled me to witness some grimly amusing sights. Here was a baker's wagon delivering bread. Soldiers approached, one signaled the driver to stop and handed him a receipt, while another unhitched the traces and walked off with the horse, leaving the amazed baker to ponder over the exigencies and misfortunes of war; and ere my taxi sped on I heard him ejaculate in the choicest cockney: "And they calls that war. War hey! well, I calls it 'ell." Next a bus would come swinging along filled with passengers; suddenly it would stop, the passengers would be asked to vacate, the bus would be filled with soldiers and go off again. Motor cars and all sorts of wagons and vehicles were appropriated for army use. It was all done in a quiet, businesslike way, and people submitted with as good a grace as possible, for as one little gamin remarked: "We must 'ave 'orses if we're to save the Hempire."

I had just time to catch the train for Liverpool which was crowded with refugees, like myself anxious to reach the peaceful shores of Uncle Sam. It was impossible to get a seat. I however improvised one out of my suitcase and monopolized a portion of the corridor, and there I sat for several hours, while tourists in more or less excitement, jostled past me.

The train reached Liverpool at eight p. m. Here I handed my trunk over to the Cunard Company, and started out to find a place to sleep, a very difficult task as all the hotels were filled and brimming over. However with the aid of a newsboy (who informed me he would go to war only that he was the sole support of his mother though judging from his appearance you would never have suspected him of being able to support even a chicken) I finally located a hotel where they had a room, and so was not compelled to pass the night on some convenient doorstep.

The next day it rained, a regular English downpour. I had been told the ship would sail at 2.30 P. M., but so many sailings had been canceled that I was tortured with anxiety in case I could not get away. I was down at the landing stage long before sailing time and early though I was, I found the place crowded with American refugees who had been pouring in from every section of the continent, all like myself anxious to get home, and all also in a state of uncertainty as to whether or not the ship would sail.

After waiting patiently for hours the signal came for us to go on board, and making my way to my stateroom I deposited my hand luggage there, and went up to the dining-room to secure a seat at table. The next thing was to run up on deck, find the steward and hire a deck chair and steamer rug, things very essential to one's comfort on an ocean voyage. This accomplished I could begin to size up my fellow passengers, watch the deck hands getting the luggage on board, and speculate how long it would be before we got under way.

The worry and anxiety incidental to obtaining transportation, the hurried rush from one end of Britain to the other had worn my nerves to a frazzle, and the relief of knowing I was actually on board bound for the United States was intense. Finally the last piece of luggage was hoisted on board, the ropes were cast off, and the ship began to move. Gradually Liverpool was left in the rear, the ship dropped down the Mersey out into the Irish Sea, and the shores of Old England faded from view.

On our way down the Mersey we passed a huge ship, painted black, guns bristling from her decks. I asked one of the ship's crew who she was. To my astonishment he replied: "That's the Aquitania, she has been converted into an auxiliary cruiser!" I gasped. It seemed incredible that that big, beautiful, wonderful floating palace, the very latest thing in marine architecture, the ship on which I had but recently been a passenger, had had her beautiful interior dismantled, her decorations torn out, her furnishings demolished, and been converted into a war ship. Her promenade decks on which I had spent many happy hours, were now patroled by armed men. Such is war!

There were three other passengers in my stateroom. A young Swedish girl, who had landed in England the day previous en route for Sweden, who found she could not get across the North Sea and had no alternative but to go back to America. There was a lady from Minneapolis who had been traveling on the continent, and whose experiences were most exciting. The third was an elderly Jewish lady, who was coming out to America to make her home with her daughter. I completed the quartette.

The first day on board ship is always interesting. You study your fellow voyagers, and invariably little groups of people whose tastes and sympathies run in similar channels get together, but without in any way disturbing the universal air of kinship which is always part of life aboard ship.

Everyone of course had some experience to tell relative to the war, or of some plan that had been upset as a result of the universal conflagration.

When I went to turn in for the night, I found the Jewish lady, who was making her first acquaintance with the boisterous billows of the Atlantic, busily engaged, with the assistance of the steward, in the undignified process of scattering her dinner broadcast, and between spills moaning: "Ach Gott I vos dying! dying! Oh, vy did I efer dry to cross der Adlantic Ozshun, and maybe I vos captured by der Chermans alretty yet. If my goot husband had only lived I would be by my own home safe. Oh, vy vos I such a foolishness?" My roommates and self used all our persuasive eloquence in trying to console and reassure our suffering companion but in vain. She refused to be comforted and kept up her moaning, until the lady from Minneapolis threatened to have her thrown overboard, when she instantly became quiet, and we clambered into our bunks and were soon fast asleep. During the night a storm came up, the wind blew a gale and the big ship rolled and plunged atrociously. This painful and distressing tangoing of the big vessel I learned was due to the fact that, thanks to the war, she had no cargo in her hold to steady her movements, and in consequence was top heavy.

In the morning we were all more or less sick. I managed to get on deck and into my steamer chair, and stayed there the rest of the day, making frequent trips to the ship's side, to donate to the fishes my previous day's ballast, something the majority of the passengers were also busily engaged in doing, and which left us as wobbly as the Laconia herself.

After staying on deck as long as I could, I managed to get back to my stateroom only to find the Jewish lady, like Vesuvius, still in irruption, pleading the while with the steward to turn the ship round and take her back home. The next morning I had succumbed, and was too sick to even get on deck, and had to lie and listen to the old lady who had got past the dying stage, and was now, she assured us, actually dead. The next day the wind subsided, the vessel behaved as though it were in a prohibition state, and quit acting like a Kentuckian with a lemon extract jag, and I began to feel that life was really worth living. My two roommates and I managed to get on deck, where under an awning which afforded protection from sun and rain, we took solid comfort in our steamer chairs. Our circle was augmented by four physicians whose names are known from coast to coast. They had been abroad to attend the big Medical Conference in London, and had been forced to take passage in the steerage in order to get home. Ample funds had enabled them to get transferred to the second cabin, as some people who had engaged second cabin berths had failed to make connections. There was also a group of young college girls who had been touring abroad, but had been chased home by the war, and who had also managed to get transferred from the steerage to our more luxurious quarters. There too, was a college professor, who though traveling first-class, frankly preferred our side of the boat, and spent most of his time with us. In addition to the medical specialists we had with us a diplomat on a special mission from the British Government to Washington, whose dignity was considerably punctured because he had been obliged to content himself with second-class accommodations.

But of all the eighteen hundred passengers aboard, one, a minister of national fame, will live longest in my memory. He was everywhere at once. In fact he was so ubiquitous that if I had glimpsed him snoozing on the smokestack I should not have been at all surprised. You'd find him conducting a revival meeting among the stokers, leading a prayer meeting in the first cabin or singing Gospel hymns in the steerage, or attempting to climb the crow's nest in search of Germans. His voice could be heard booming above the roar of the gale or the wash of the waves. He had bunches of stories which he retailed between prayers and sermons, with immense gusto. His favorite story which he retailed on an average five times a day was as follows:

"A minister had a wife to whom he was very devoted. She died, and to show his appreciation of her many virtues, he had engraved on her tombstone: 'The light of mine eyes hath gone out.' About six months after the lady's demise, the bishop paid him a visit, and seeing the tombstone, congratulated him on the exquisitely beautiful way he had expressed his devotion to his dead wife. The minister sighed deeply and said: "I'm awfully sorry I ever had that inscription carved." "Why so?" inquired the bishop. "Because," replied the minister, "while it is not generally known, I have been engaged to Mrs. So and So for the last two months." "Oh, that's all right," said the bishop, "just send for the man who carved the inscription, and have him add these words: 'The light of mine eyes hath gone out, but I have struck another match!'"

We were shadowed by the Aquitania, who though invisible was within wireless call, ready to rush to our aid in case of need, until we came within the protective zone of the British North American cruiser fleet. But though in a sense under the Aquitania's wing, we felt far from secure, as no auxiliary cruiser is a match for a real battleship; and anxious eyes constantly swept the horizon, for we never knew at what moment the Karlhruhe or some other equally dangerous unit of the Kaiser's fleet might be sending shots across our bows. So north we went to keep out of the regular steamer lanes, so far north that we could feel if we could not see "Greenland's Icy Mountains," or sight Doc Cook over the horizon wandering home with a section of the North Pole in his possession. Cold, well cold was no name for it, it was frigid. The steam heat was turned on, and we piled on every rag we had to keep from freezing. For two days we ran through a dense fog, creeping along without blowing a single blast on our siren. The danger of such a proceeding was great, and many passengers with recollections of the Titanic and the Empress of Ireland disasters became almost hysterical. The majority of us however preferred to risk collision to capture, and though worried and nervous felt confident that the captain would pull us through.

The war of course was almost the sole topic of conversation. Each and everyone had some exciting experience to relate regarding it, and the clicking wireless told us how closely our movements were being watched. Every night when darkness fell the portholes and windows were closed and blanketed, not a light showed on deck. Our ship was a thing of darkness, a huge, black phantom flitting silently o'er the ocean. One morning we'd hear that a German cruiser had been sighted during the night and was now a hundred miles in our rear; several times the capture of the Teutonic and Virginian (ships which sailed from Liverpool on the day of our departure) was reported; these little incidents all tending to keep us at the top notch of excitement. The sight of a fishing schooner off the banks of Newfoundland got us all worked up. The Jewish lady was certain it was a "German spy" and went below to pack her suitcase so as to be ready for all emergencies.

During the voyage our ship was repainted to resemble a Scandinavian vessel, and if anyone who watched her leave Liverpool could have seen her come up New York Bay, they would not have recognized her. We had stormy day, foggy days and cold days. Toward the end of the voyage we had beautiful, clear sunshiny weather, when the sea was smooth and blue; nights when the reflection from the moon threw a pathway of silver on the water, like a broad highway leading to the stars.

Throughout the voyage there was a feeling of camaraderie, friendliness and kindness on board that I have never felt before on any ocean liner, and that feeling included the crew as well as the passengers. One touch of danger seemed to have made all on board kin, and the spirit of mutual helpfulness animated us all, and when after a nine days' voyage our ship anchored in New York Bay (which seemed like a furnace after the frigid regions through which we had been voyaging) though we were all glad to get safely home, still we were sorry that the inevitable time for parting had come. I will always remember that voyage, trying as it was, with the keenest pleasure, though I trust that never again will it be my lot to be on board an ocean liner in time of war.

Amendments by the American Poultry Association

So many of our poultry people have become interested in shows and thoroughbred birds that I am sure they will be interested in hearing of the amendments made by the Poultry Association at its last general meeting, especially as Anconas are very much benefited by the new arrangements. They are a comparatively new breed in America, yet many of our readers have written, asking about them, during the last year. When I gave a full description of them and a history of the club some eighteen months ago, there was only one variety recognized by the Poultry Association—the single comb birds. But several fanciers had been working diligently, and had succeeded in developing flocks of birds true to every point of the original Ancona, but with rose combs instead of single combs. Naturally, these men felt aggrieved that these birds were barred from show honors, because they had not been acknowledged and given a class in the Standard of Perfection. However, the committee which constitutes the American Poultry Association, and who control all changes and amendments in the Standard, have now decided to enroll the rose combs, and give them equal rights with the original single comb birds.

I have frequently been asked why fanciers desire to establish rose comb birds in all the different breeds. The answer is very simple when understood. So many of the eastern and northern states have such severe winters, that single comb birds are in constant danger of having their combs frozen in ordinary poultry-houses, and as you all know, if birds get their combs frozen, it interferes with their egg production, fertility of eggs for hatching, and ruins the birds' appearance. So there is always an advantage in a rose comb, which lies close to the head, and does not suffer even if the temperature remains below zero for weeks at a time.

Ten other varieties that have for a number of years been knocking on the door of the Poultry Standard have finally been admitted and officially recognized. After hearing the reports of the champions of these new breeds, delegates of the American Poultry Association agreed that the birds had standard qualifications, and passed upon them favorably.

Included in this group are the White Houdans, silver Campines, single comb blue Andalsians, rose comb white Minorcas, salmon Faverolles, Nulle fleur booted Bantams, gray Japanese Bantams, buff ducks, and pencilled runner ducks. Three other varieties that were also strongly supported by the revision committee were turned down after considerable discussion. These were the rose comb white Orpingtons, black Orpingtons, and buff Orpingtons. It was argued that the individual characteristics of these breeds were not defined clearly enough to warrant their admission.

By way of solving the problem that had been presented by the difference of opinion as to whether the Campines belonged to the English, Dutch or Belgian variety, the association assigned this breed to a new division to be known as the Continental Class.

Among other important matters disposed of by the national delegates were the reinstatement of symmetry in the standard scale of points in judging poultry, the decision to publish for the first time a market, poultry and egg standard, the licensing of new judges and the adoption of new standard weights for Leghorns. These weights have been fixed at four pounds for the hen, five and one half pounds for the cock, four and one half pounds for cockerels, and three and one half pounds for pullets.

On the question of poultry show judges, Charles D. Cleveland, who is secretary of the Madison Square Garden show, declared himself in favor of revoking all licenses and of requiring an examination, including actual judging and both oral and written tests of the applicant's knowledge of the subject. Mr. Cleveland stated that he was sure that licenses had been granted to persons not competent to judge poultry. He was opposed particularly to the practise of granting general licenses to judge all varieties believing that no man is qualified to do such judging. When it came to a vote, however, Mr. Cleveland's proposition was defeated.

Fireless Brooders

As several of our readers have asked how to make a fireless brooder, I am going to give the dimensions and working plan, even though I wrote on this subject some time last spring, for I realize that many of our new subscribers haven't old magazines to which to refer.

The early chicks hatched in an incubator must be provided with a comfortable foster-mother, or their lives will be miserable and short, so a brooder must be in readiness before the hatch is due. If you are planning to have chicks out in cold weather, and have no house or room which can be heated, you will have to buy an outdoor brooder heated by a lamp. But if you are not going to have chickens till after April 15th, or have a house where a stove can be put up, a fireless box brooder, which you can easily make yourself, is better than a lamp machine. A good outdoor brooder costs from nine to thirteen dollars, according to the make.

When I first raised broilers, I had no regular brooder house, I used outdoor brooders, which cost nine dollars each. They had two compartments; one fitted with a round hover, and heated by a lamp. The other just a plain box, well-lighted, where they could play and gain the exercise which is necessary. From fifty to seventy-five chicks did well in them until they were four weeks old, even when the weather was too severe for them to go out of the brooder.

The first requisite is a box two feet square, and seven inches deep, with a lid at least five inches deep. Or if you can get two strong boxes the same size, which are six or seven inches deep, take off the lids, and use one of the bottoms for a lid. Put two hinges at the back, and a hook and eye at the front. Cut a hole three inches square in the center of the front, for the chicks to run in and out of. At both ends of the lid or top box make half-inch holes three inches apart and an inch from the top. This completes the outside of the brooder. Put cleats in each corner of the top and bottom boxes, two inches from the top. Then make a frame to fit inside the box and rest upon the cleats; cover it with burlap, and then cut a long strip of felt, flannel, or old blanket, or any soft woolen material. It does not matter much what it is so long as it is warm and woolly. It should be about four inches wide. Make cuts one inch apart the entire length, leaving about half an inch as a heading. Then stitch the fringed material to the burlap, commencing in the center of the frame, and going round and round; the rows to be about an inch apart. At first, put the frame on to the cleats in the lower part of the brooder, with the fringed material hanging down, to make a comfortable covering for the chicks. After the babies are about two weeks old, the frame must be put on to the cleats in the top part of the box, which will lift the ends of the material about three inches from the floor of your brooder.

At first, when the screen is in the lower half of the brooder, fold a piece of cotton batting and fit carefully over it, filling in the entire space to the edge of the box. In the top half, put a layer of excelsior about an inch and a half deep, then fill in with cotton batting to the edge. The burlap on the frame being porous, and the cotton batting ditto, allows a perfect system of ventilation from the front opening to the holes in the top part of the brooder. Of course, when the frame is moved to the top part of the brooder, some of the cotton batting has to be removed, but by that time the chicks have grown considerably, and furnish a great deal more animal heat than they did at first.

After the babies are about four weeks old, it is well to take out the frame with the fringed woolen material attached, and use another frame covered with burlap, which is to keep the cotton batting in place.

Before using the brooder, give it a coat of whitewash, and cover the floor with sweepings from the haymow, or finely-cut hay, to make a warm carpet for the chicks to stand on. Of course, such brooders should be well housed in a light, dry place. A good coop can be made out of a piano or large dry-goods box. A piano box can usually be got for about two dollars from any store that sells pianos, and will, with the addition of a couple of small windows and paint or roofing paper, make it waterproof. It makes a good house in which to keep two or three such brooders.

In front of each brooder there should be a wire enclosure, so that the chicks can run out and play without the flocks getting mixed up. After they are two weeks old, it is well to make small outdoor runs, but never let them out in damp or windy weather.

Correspondence

M. R.—Will you please tell me what is the matter with my chickens? They get sore eyes and mope around and don't eat anything, and in a few days they die, and some have the rattles in the throat. I feed corn and wheat.

A.—I am afraid the chickens have roup, so they should be removed from the flock to prevent the disease spreading, as it is very contagious. The safest plan is to kill every affected bird and burn the bodies, for they are seldom worth much, even if cured. But if you wish to treat them, dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in half a pint of water, and bathe the face and eyes with it; also spray the throat and nostrils. Give light, nourishing food, and keep them in a dry, sunny coop.

W. H. S.—As I am a subscriber to COMFORT, I will now come to you for advice about my chickens. They are most all Leghorns, and for the last ten years I have lost quite a few; just one at a time for a week or so. Now they have pure water all the time, oats, corn, Kaffir corn and green Alfalfa to run on all the time, and in winter I feed bran and poultry food. Now, they all look so healthy and nice, the first thing you can notice before one dies is the very tip of the comb at back part turns purple, and the droppings get thin and yellowish; and another thing (but haven't noticed this lately), they will stop and start backward with their head down, and something just like saliva will run out of their mouths. The mouth is all right inside. I also keep plenty of grit out, and don't feed much corn. I keep henhouse disinfected, and all dead fowls, carried away in summer. I let them roost out of doors. I have doctored them for roup and cholera, but don't seem to have any success. It is mostly my old chickens that have it. Sometimes a young one dies. Will you please write direct to me soon and tell me what to do. I would be so grateful. I want to add that after their combs get purple, they smell like strong carbolic acid.

A.—The birds have what is known as black rot, a disease of the comb caused by poor circulation of the blood; usually the result of liver trouble. Paint the combs with the following lotion: One ounce of water; one half ounce of glycerine; two grains of carbolic acid crystals; all mixed with equal parts of dioxogen water and glycerine. Apply twice a day; keep the bird in a dry, light coop, and add to each pint of drinking water half a teaspoonful of muriate of ammonia, to remove the congested condition of the liver. And let me advise you to stop using any tonics or egg foods.

M. J. J.—I would like to hear from some COMFORT reader that has had experience with turkeys. Last year, out of seventeen hatched, I only raised four. This year, from forty I got eighteen, but one is sick. When little, I feed on bread crumbs, boiled rice with chopped green onion leaves; sometimes bread soaked in milk, and hard-boiled eggs. They all seem well until six weeks old, then they begin to droop. I do everything I ever read that's good for turkeys. I grease them and powder them, but nothing seems to help much. The droppings look yellow, and their bowels are loose. Boiled rice with ginger and spices sometimes helps. Another time I try oil with a few drops of turpentine. I just work with them just like with babies, as I have none. I am only two years on the farm, far from relatives and friends, and people don't seem very sociable here, or maybe it is because I live too far from the road. My husband doesn't want me to bother with turkeys any more, but I feel if I could not have turkeys, I would not stay on a farm, as they are company to me. They are so pretty. Pure white. Some are black, but I like the white ones the best. They roost outside and have free range. They are always picking at themselves, and I grease them and powder them, and still they do that. I bought three kinds of lice powders, but I think they aren't very good. Could you please give me directions to mix lice powder at home.

A.—The best plan is to try and get the old turkeys in good condition now, for most of the diseases which attack young turkeys are transmitted from old birds by means of microbes and germs in the droppings. So if the old birds can be thoroughly cleared of worms and their intestinal troubles before there are any young ones around, they have a much better chance for existence. Have brood coops for turkeys placed on high, dry ground far removed from any other poultry. During the winter, I use permanganate of potassium in their drinking water, as it is a wonderful germ killer. I add half an ounce of permanganate to a gallon of water, and stir thoroughly until it is all dissolved, then add one tablespoonful of the mixture to every quart of drinking water. When outside sources of drinking water are frozen over, you are pretty sure that the birds will drink the water provided for them near home, and so get sufficient permanganate to be of service. Sour milk is also a good purifier, and should be given to the birds regularly. We give it to young ones from the time they are hatched. To make a good insect powder at home, slake one peck of lime, and add two ounces of carbolic acid; mix it very thoroughly, then add as much tobacco dust as you can stir into it. Let it dry, and then roll down to a powder. Keep it in jars or cans with air-tight lids. Another good home-made powder is gained by mixing equal parts of very fine coal ashes and tobacco dust, and then moistening the mixture with kerosene oil in which crude naphtha flakes have been dissolved. Use as much of the naphtha as the oil will absorb. If you have any difficulty in getting crude naphtha flakes at your drug-store, you may be able to get some of the preparations for killing moths and insects which are sold under such names as "mothaline" and "naphtha camphor." Any such preparation—even the ordinary camphor balls—will do almost as well as the naphtha flakes. I don't believe in greasing young turkeys or any other young birds, for the grease opens the pores of the skin and makes them susceptible to cold and bowel trouble.

A. A.—Last year I had a Leghorn cockerel with a one-sided tail. His tail just fell over to one side, and by the time he was grown, that side of him was shorter than the other. Now I have a Rhode Island Red cockerel in the same fix, only I trimmed the feathers so the tail would not be heavy, thinking that might be the cause. Would this rooster do to breed from next spring? He was hatched from eggs I ordered. I saw in October COMFORT where a lady mentions a fireless brooder made after your directions, and information contained in April COMFORT. As I was not getting COMFORT then, I would be glad to get this information.

A.—It would not be advisable to breed from a bird with a crooked tail for the fault would be reproduced in most of his progeny. For plan of fireless brooder please look at the beginning of this article, where I have given a full description, as several other correspondents have asked for the same information.

M. J.—Will you please tell me how to distinguish a gander from a goose, and is it necessary to change ganders each year.

A.—It is very difficult to describe how a young goose can be told from a young gander. There is a slight difference in the cry, walk, and general carriage, and the fluffy feathers on the under part of the body appear to lay in a circle up to the vent in the goose, whereas with the gander there appears to be a parting right through the center. But such signs are not distinctive enough to be surely discernible to an inexperienced person, so I advise you to consult some person in your neighborhood who is used to geese.

P. L.—Will you please tell me where there is a poultry farm near my place, or the nearest one, and where I can buy all poultry foods, such as grits and seeds, and all kinds of food for hen and chicken.

A.—Write to the Sypher Company, 20 Union St., Boston, Mass., and ask them for the name and address of their representative in your vicinity.

L. P.—Will you please tell me what's the matter with my little chicks? They are a month old, and have little blisters and scabs on their heads. A neighbor of mine said they had the chicken pox. What is good for that? Please let me know if children catch the chicken pox from chickens when they have it. I am an old subscriber for eight or nine years, but never have written before.

A.—Your neighbor is most likely correct, for the description suggests bird or chicken pox, which is a contagious disease, so all birds attacked by it should be removed from the rest of the flock and kept in a coop removed from the rest of the poultry, and be sure that you clean and disinfect the house from which they have been taken, and all water and food dishes which they may have used. Doctor the sick birds as follows: Rub carbolic vaseline or any pure ointment on the eruptions, to soften them, and after about an hour, wash with warm, soapy water, removing as much of the scab as possible. Then bathe with a solution of boric acid. If the eyes are very inflamed, fill an eye dropper with the solution, and squeeze two or three drops into each eye three times a day. Repeat the treatment until a cure is effected, which may be in one or two weeks.

May.—I am anxious to raise some kinds of chickens. Please tell me what is the best kinds of pullets or laying hens to lay eggs all the year round? Where could I get a poultry book about buying some settings of eggs? If winter eggs were laid and saved for hatching, do you think they are good and all right to put under these old hens to hatch out in March or April? I shall be thankful if I understand them.

A.—Leghorns and Anconas are supposed to be the very best egg-producing breeds, and I think they are for warm climates. But taking the year round in the Eastern and Western states, I think White Wyandottes and Rhode Island Reds are more reliable, and they are certainly much better table birds, so more profitable, as the young cockerels can be sold as broilers when from nine to twelve weeks old, and two-year-old hens are large enough to bring good prices. Eggs for hatching should not be more than two weeks old, and I prefer to use them before they are a week old. The shell of an egg is porous, so evaporation is going on from the time it is laid, which, of course, means that the quality which is necessary to feed and nourish the embryo chick is being wasted if the egg is kept any length of time before incubation starts. Look through the advertisement columns of COMFORT and of your local newspaper, and write to breeders for their catalogues and price-lists.

D. S. G.—Please give me a remedy or a preventive for sore head among chickens. I have about seventy-five, and all but five or six have it. I really don't know whether it is sore head or chicken pox. I never have been troubled with either until now. Little yellow blisters start around the beak and gills, then turn to sores, and the eyes will swell until they are blind. Some of them will have large knots or hornlike things come out on their heads. I have lost but one yet. Have been using sulphur and grease, which has helped some of them, but others seem to be doing no good. I hear that the same disease is quite general over our neighborhood. I live on a farm and my chickens have a free range. I have kept my henhouse whitewashed and cleaned regular all the year.

A.—Please read answer to L. P.

J. C.—I would like you to tell me what ails my roosters and pullets. They are fat and eat heartily. They sit around in the evening; the next morning they can't hold their heads up to eat. They pick and pick and don't get anything. They seem as if their necks and throats were sore. My chickens are mixed. I had one rooster that was sick this way. I gave him carbolic acid water and he is still living. I cut one open. They are fat. Their liver is in good shape. Could they be too fat? They are awful fat. We feed corn and mash. They have plenty of ground to rustle for themselves. Will my young roosters do for my pullets this year? My chickens were hatched off in March. They have not started to lay. They are nice and large as grown hens. My chickens have white droppings come from them, as white as the white of an egg.

A.—As the birds are so extremely fat, I imagine that is the foundation of the trouble, but your description of symptoms is so meager that I cannot form a correct idea of what is the matter with them. Try adding a teaspoonful of magnesia to every quart of drinking water every third day for two or three weeks. If the young birds were hatched from eggs laid by strong, vigorous stock, which were not related, it will do no harm to mate them this season, but don't continue the practise in future years. It is always better to mate cockerels with old hens, and old roosters to young pullets.

C. H. P.—I am coming with a grievance of my own this time. I have about twenty-five hens and about sixty spring and summer chickens. They all sneeze and shake their heads—that is, the young chickens do—and when the old chickens take it they breathe like a person with a bad case of asthma, and they don't last very long. I haven't lost any young chickens with it so far, but they don't seem to get any better. Have been giving them coal oil in their water, and I tried red paint before, but all to no avail. I have about one hundred and twenty fall chicks, but they are beginning to droop, and I lose one every now and then. I noticed this morning that most of the older ones' heads are swollen, and water runs out of their eyes and mouths. I feed them wheat and cooked clabber. Could their running in the dew have anything to do with it? Please advise me what to do about my chickens for I am certainly discouraged. Do you think I can even get it out of my chickens altogether? I hate so bad to sell them all and get more, as I might do worse.

A.—I fear you have to fight an epidemic of malignant roup, which is a most contagious disease, but as many forms of cold resemble roup so closely as to make it almost impossible to be sure without personal examination, I may be wrong. The one unmistakable symptom of the true malignant roup is the stale, offensive odor which is always present. Open the bird's beak and if there is no odor on the breath you may be pretty sure it is only a roupy cold they have, which will be comparatively easy to cure if taken in time. But if neglected, the cold is always liable to develop into roup, so it is advisable to treat the birds for that disease without waiting to be sure of the extent of the trouble. Remove the birds that show signs of illness, and confine them in coops in some sheltered outhouse, far removed from the chicken-house. Disinfect house, nests, feed and water dishes, as a protection to the rest of the flock. The sick birds should be fed very lightly on nutritious food, and treated as follows: Dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the mixture with four of water, and spray the bird's throat, mouth, nostrils and eyes twice or three times a day for a week or ten days. If the bird is not considerably better at the end of that time, it would be advisable to kill it and burn the carcase. Don't use any of the birds which have been attacked in your breeding pens, no matter how well they may seem to be by spring, for if you do, the chicks are almost sure to be weak, and slow to develop, and in many cases show unmistakable signs of rheumatism and kindred ailments.

E. M. B.—I would like you to tell me through your paper what would cause a canary bird to lose its head and neck feathers and also the tail feathers. Its head and neck are as bald as the palm of your hand. The bird belongs to a friend of mine. I don't have any trouble with my birds. I raised four young birds and they were all male birds. Arch Mountain Warblers. I have sold them all at three dollars each. My trouble with them is a mite that gets on them and in the cage. I would like to know how to get rid of them completely.

A.—Unless the canary has moulted, the loss of feathers is probably due to a small red mite. The cage should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. The

Contagious Foot-and-Mouth Disease

THIRTEEN states are under federal and state quarantine on account of this disease at the time of this writing (Nov. 10) and for that reason it will be well for your readers to be correctly informed regarding the malady.

The disease is the most contagious ailment of cattle and affects all cloven-footed animals. It attacks the lining membrane of the mouth, the teats and udder and the skin of the feet of cattle, but in sheep and swine the feet commonly are most affected. Vesicles (blisters) appear upon the affected parts and contain clear liquid. The vesicles burst in one to three days after appearing and the liquid contaminates everything with which it comes in contact and from contaminated objects the disease spreads like wild fire.

The ailment is caused by a virus so small that it has never been detected by microscope and passes through a porous filter of porcelain. For these reasons the scientists call it an "ultra-microscopic or filterable virus." The vesicles contain the virus in its pure state. When they burst the profuse saliva becomes contaminated with the virus and therefore is virulent and the chief cause of the spread of the disease. Common sources of the disease are animals, hides, hair, hoofs, horns, wool and milk. Always there is a preexisting outbreak of the disease when a new outbreak appears. The disease once came to this country in vaccine against smallpox brought in from some foreign country. The exact source of the present outbreak has not yet been determined. A new phase of the matter in this outbreak is the contamination of serum against hog cholera and the spread of the disease by means of this serum. It was made at the Union Stock Yards, Chicago, and report has it that some $20,000 worth of the serum has been destroyed and that inspectors are visiting each place to which serum has lately been shipped by the affected manufacturing establishment.

The disease appears after an incubation period of two to five days; in rare instances eleven days. The attacked animal has a fever of two to four degrees, loses appetite, shows reddened membranes of the mouth and the skin of the teats, udder and feet. Soon salivation starts and the saliva drools or froths from the mouth. The blisters appear in one to three days after the appearance of the disease and soon burst leaving angry red sores which soon crust over and start to heal, unless infected by dirt. The vesicles on the feet are most likely to turn into obstinate sores as they become contaminated from manure, dirt and soiled bedding. The animal is lame, stiff, persists in lying down, has supression of milk, may abort and, being unable to eat, loses flesh quickly. After the healing process starts appetite is resumed and the animal gradually recovers; but there is a possibility that the apparently recovered animal may remain a foot-and-mouth disease "carrier" and spread the disease for an indefinite period. This has not been proved; but it is feared as a possibility. It is a well-known and serious phase of typhoid fever of man. When an animal recovers from an attack it is not left immune, but is liable to another attack whenever subjected to contagion, and one cow has been known to have three attacks inside of one year. Man may become affected by drinking the raw milk of affected cows. Infants attacked suffer severely and may die. The disease is not at all common in man. Milk is perfectly safe if boiled or pasteurized to 140 degrees. Butter or cheese from infected milk may also cause the disease.

Foot-and-mouth disease will not cause a mortality of more than two to five per cent in the worst circumstances, and does not ordinarily kill more than one per cent of animals attacked. It is so terribly infectious or contagious however that federal and state authorities instantly kill all affected animals and bury them deeply in quicklime. They also maintain a strict quarantine upon infected stables, farms, markets and districts, entire states being so quarantined and all movement of animals, unless for immediate slaughter, being prohibited. The virus is readily killed by a two to five per cent solution of carbolic acid, cresol compound or formaldehyde. After killing the diseased animals, the authorities thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the premises and then everything is sprayed and flooded with freshmade limewash. The great stockyards at Chicago and some other places where the disease has appeared are being so treated now and in a few days from this writing it is hoped that the quarantine at these places may be raised. Meanwhile the 700 valuable animals in the National Dairy Show buildings at the Chicago yards are quarantined and being treated, for they are worth probably $350,000. This policy is a departure from the previous one of the Bureau of Animal Industry to kill and bury all attacked animals and even animals exposed to the disease. It is to be hoped that no spread of the disease will occur from the apparently recovered animals when they are allowed to return home. At the present time the outcome of this matter cannot be predicted and it may transpire that slaughter yet will be ordered. The International Live Stock Exposition which was to be held at the Chicago Stock Yards Nov. 28 to Dec. 6 has been "called off."

See "Questions and Answers" in this department for further information as to foot-and-mouth disease.

Developing the Colt Perfectly

Every foal should be the product of intelligent correct breeding; not haphazard, hit-and-miss mating. Too many misfits and mongrels are produced. They fail to make high-class horses, even when properly fed and managed. Born wrong they do not grow aright. It is also lamentably true that many colts born right are raised wrong. Every farmer should aim to mate only suitable sires and dams for the production of ideal horses, for the various purposes, and then should feed and develop the product perfectly. Only a pure-bred sire can beget a grade horse. He also must be sound, muscular, suitable in height and predominant in the features that are desired if the colt is to be ideal. This is equally true of his mate. The sire does not necessarily correct, in his progeny, the serious faults of conformation of his mate. He reproduces only those of his features which are stronger or dominant over the corresponding features of the mare. She stamps as surely upon her offspring those of her undesirable traits, which are dominant over the corresponding traits of the sire. To have a colt born right, so that it will develop right, the qualities of both sire and dam should b as similar and ideal as possible. Violent crosses should be avoided. The most prepotent pure-bred sire should be used. The use of all other sires is mere waste of time and money. Given a foal that is born right its development should not be left to chance or luck. It can only materialize the hereditary possibilities of its breeding if perfectly nourished. The inadequately fed and consequently stunted foal never attains full size or value. At least one half of the growth and weight of a horse is attained during the first twelve months of life. That is therefore the most important period in the life of a foal.

The pregnant mare should be fully fed to insure adequate nourishment of her fetus and an abundance of milk for its reception. She should be as well fed while nursing the foal. If the foal is to make perfect growth it must, from its earliest days, be provided with oatmeal, then crushed oats and wheat bran and afterwards an abundance of whole oats, bran, grass, hay and roots. There is no time in the life of a horse when the feeding of oats and bran is so profitable. The foal that is not fed may lack at maturity twenty-five per cent or more of the size, weight, strength and value possible through heredity. Overfeeding and pampering must be avoided, however, as they may prove injurious or ruinous. Then, too, if care is not taken to train the foal's hoofs properly they may grow crooked and throw the leg bones out of plumb. This will spoil action and utility at maturity. The feet must be made level and true by expert rasping once a month or so during the growing years. Such trimming is all-important. If postponed it soon becomes too late to help; the mischief is done.

Farm Problems for Winter Study

There are certain phases of farming that can best be studied in winter time when work is slack and the evenings are long. The majority of these winter problems relate to the business side of farming.

Farming as a Business

Did you, Mr. Farmer, ever stop to figure out how much you really had invested in your business? If not, there is no better time than now. But why should you do this? Because, in every business the first item of expense is Interest on the Investment. Every other business man first carefully calculates how much he must earn with which to pay this interest. The case is no different with the farmer. Farming should be conducted on the same basis as any other organized business.

The Size of the Farm Investment

Let any business man in any city of the Middle West get into his automobile and drive across the country stopping at every farmhouse on the way. Let him make a rough estimate of the value of every farm, including stock and equipment, that he visits, then drive back home and down its principal streets stopping at every business place that he passes. Let him estimate the value of each of these, average them all up and compare these average values with the average values of the farms and their stock and equipments. He will doubtless be very greatly surprised to learn that the average farmer has quite as large an investment as the average business man.

When land was cheap and farming correspondingly unprofitable the farmer became accustomed to neglect this factor in his business. His investment was not large and the interest charge consequently made less difference to him. But times have changed and are still changing. The inventory of a well-equipped 160-acre farm in the Middle West will look something like this:

Land, 160 acres at $125 per acre,	$20,000.00
Buildings	4,500.00
Machinery and tools	500.00
Live Stock	2,500.00
Crops, etc., on hand	200.00
Household Goods	400.00
Supplies on hand	100.00
Total,	$28,200.00

At six per cent the interest charge on this amount will be $1,692.00. Don't think you can neglect this interest item just because you own your farm free of debt and do not have to pay it out; the farm owes it to you and must pay you that before you can figure any profit or any pay for your own work. The large items of expense on such a farm will be approximately:

Interest	$1,692.00
Taxes	200.00
Insurance	25.00
Labor (man and horse)	1,200.00
Incidentals	83.00
Total,	$3,200.00

In the above, allowance has been made, as it should be, for all labor whether done by the members of the family, the farmer himself or hired help. It will be readily observed that the total expense on this farm averages $20 per acre. It is this amount that the owner must receive before he gets any profit at all for his business ability as manager of the farm. Hence the need for careful planning.

Taking the Farm Inventory

The first step in farm planning is the taking of the inventory. Winter is the best time to do this for two reasons; the farmer is not crowded with work and has time to give to it, and his crops and stock are housed in the most convenient form for this purpose.

The farmer may make his own inventory by setting down on sheets of paper everything he owns that pertains to the farm and its operations, giving each item its proper value, as nearly as he can estimate it, and then adding all together. Blanks for this purpose may be obtained from most of the agricultural colleges or may be had for the asking by writing direct to the Office of Farm Management, U. S. Department of Agriculture.

After the Inventory, What Next?

The inventory is the first step in improving the business methods on the farm. The next is a careful study of the various branches of the business. Here are several suggestive questions that will furnish food for thought for many a long winter evening. Let interested farmers try them on themselves:

1. Am I farming too much land for the amount of labor that I am using on this land?
2. Do I keep my labor, horse and man, profitably employed all the year round?
3. Do I need more labor or less land, or less labor or more land?
4. Am I making a profit on the labor that I am employing?
5. Have I adequate buildings?
6. Have I spent too much money in buildings upon which I must pay or charge interest but which yield me no profit?
7. Is my farm properly equipped with machinery and tools?
8. Are my tools properly housed and otherwise cared for?
9. Am I keeping enough live stock to keep up the fertility of my soil? Am I feeding my grains and forage crops to live stock at a profit and keeping up soil fertility, or am I continually robbing my soil?
10. Is the stock that I am keeping of the right quality to yield largest returns?
11. Am I using enough circulating capital?

Note: By "circulating capital" we mean capital invested in stock and machinery as distinguished from "fixed" capital," that invested in buildings and lands.

12. Am I and is my family getting all that we should in the way of comforts and enjoyment out of life?

Thought and study on these twelve questions and others that will suggest themselves when the farmer begins taking an inventory will enable him to better plan his farm for next year. To test the results of such planning he should take another inventory at the close of the year, carefully comparing it with the previous year, for the purpose of still further improving his farm practise. Now is the time to take your inventory and to begin the careful study of your farm problems.

Provide Potash in Winter

Potato fertilizers are much in use in the principal fruit and truck growing sections of the United States. Potash more than any other element seems to be necessary for the complete development of both vegetables and fruits. Where the soils have been intensively cropped for long periods of time they are likely to be deficient in this element.

Up to the present time Germany has been our chief source of potash fertilizers. Since the opening of the European war, however, their importation has practically ceased. Truck and fruit growers must now look to other sources for their potash supply.

Potash in the Soil

Chemical analyses show that there is usually an adequate supply of potash in most soils. However, this is often combined with other elements in such a way as to be unavailable for the use of plants. To such soils available potash must be added or some other substance that will release the stored-up potash already in the soil for the use of plants.

Nitrogen Fertilizers and Potash

Dealers in nitrogen fertilizers like nitrate of soda and sulphate of ammonia claim that the use of their goods on such soils will release the "locked-up" potash. Nitrate of soda is mined in large quantities in South America and sulphate of ammonia is made in this country as a by-product in the manufacture of iron and in other ways. While it has not been clearly demonstrated that their use on fruit and vegetable lands will produce the same effect that will be produced by the use of potash fertilizers, the experiment is well worth while at this time. Fruit and truck growers should try them out on a small scale, remembering that the nitrogen which they contain may produce a heavy growth of stem and foliage at the expense of fruit and root.

Potash and Wood Ashes

Wood ashes are a productive source of potash. They contain about eight per cent of potash. This would make them worth, at the current price of potash, about 25 cents a bushel or 40 cents per hundred pounds. They are therefore well worth saving. Since the potash in wood is in a readily soluble form the ashes must be kept dry. If permitted to leach much of their fertility will be lost. A ton of unleached wood ashes applied to an acre of garden soil should be ample. In wood burning sections the collection, storage and sale of wood ashes may soon become an important industry.

Ashes Made from Waste Products

The ashes now wasted by wood burning mills should become an important source of potash supply. Tobacco stems, bark, sawdust, cotton seed hulls and waste pulp from cane mills are all possible sources of ashes, which will be even richer than wood ashes, containing as high as 30 per cent of potash. The cutting off of our foreign supply will doubtless develop our fertilizer industry at home, particularly the potash business. Winter is the time to save the ashes.

Distillery Slop as Hog Feed

The Kentucky Experiment Station has just announced the results of an experiment in the use of distillery slop which will be of more than usual interest to hog raisers in the near vicinity of distilleries. Fifty animals were fed for twenty-four days on this slop. They showed an average daily gain of over a pound each, or a total gain of 1,265 in the 24 days. The slop was charged for at the rate of 25 cents per barrel and the cost of producing this pork at the above rate was only $1.89 per hundred. This economy of pork production makes this a rather remarkable experiment.

It must not be overlooked, however, that these pigs weighed only a little over 100 pounds each at the beginning of the experiment and were fed for a very short period of time, both large factors in the economic production of pork. In our article on "What it Costs to Make Pork," in the November issue of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer we pointed out that young pigs and a short feeding period make cheapest pork. These factors must not be overlooked in this experiment.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

TROUBLE WITH BELGIAN HARES.—As I see so many others have received good advice from your farm department I avail myself of the privilege asking information about my Belgian hares. I have three hundred of them that I raised myself. But the last breeding from the same does has been a total failure. My does refuse to build nests. Although I gave them boxes and plenty of straw, they will not use them and the young are born on the bare floor and die. Fifteen of my does did so with their last litters although they raised their previous litters successfully. I can't understand why they do so. I have lost seventy-five young rabbits this month. They do not appear to be sick. I had been feeding them oats, then I changed to whole barley and all the young and some old ones died. I feed Alfalfa hay with grain such as oats, wheat and barley. Have stopped feeding barley. Was it the barley, or what do you think killed them? What do you advise? MRS. W. N., Mannette, Wash.

A.—This is the usual experience of those who breed Belgian hares on a large scale. They may succeed for a time, but sooner or later disease kills off the animals. They do not stand confinement and pampering and the houses and pens and yards become infected. The sudden change of feed from oats to barley, no doubt, proved fatal. Any change of feed must be made gradually. Barley is not a suitable feed. Oats is better. Does that are to have young should be separated and given new clean hutches with dark, secluded well-bedded boxes for nests. It is necessary to introduce new blood now and then by buying new bucks or by swapping bucks with some other breeder who has strong, healthy bucks not related to your stock.

DISEASED BELGIAN HARES.—I have been taking COMFORT for a few years and am very much interested in its farm department. I would like some pointers on Belgian hares. My boy is raising Belgian hares and has had very good success until recently. One large doe had ten young. When they were eight days old the mother seemed to be all right except that she did not eat, and two days later she died in great pain. Had been feeding green dandelions, kale and barley crushed or rolled. Should she have had water? I was told to give no water. Another Giant doe, very large, has had three young ones thus far, one each day for three successive days, all born dead. This doe seems strong and healthy, but has a large pouch-like swelling on her neck. What caused this swelling? Why are the young born dead? Is she too old? At what age is a buck too old for service? I do not know the doe's age. MRS. F. W. S., Eureka, Cal.

Forecasts for Mid-Winter Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

9987

EVERMORE attractive, and evermore varied are the new fashion features, portrayed in the styles of this season. For slim and youthful figures, blouses with gathered body and deep yoke portions are most becoming. One sees these yoke effects in various outlines; some with set-in sleeves, others in kimono style, while many have raglan sleeve portions cut in one with back or front.

A delightfully chic touch may be given to a waist by the addition of a smart cape over the back, joined or buttoned at the shoulder.

Waists with sash ends, crossed in front in surplice style and tied in back or at the side, are new and novel.

Skirts are gradually growing wider; the necessary width being gained by seams cut more bias, added gores, or plaited sections.

Tunics seem to rank first by way of skirt drapery, and redingote suits are extremely popular

One sees smart afternoon gowns, in basque and redingote modes, and a charming effect is produced by dainty collar and cuffs of batiste.

Suede girdles are new and novel. One attractive style had a patch pocket; the girdle was fastened with large jet buttons and bound with black silk braid.

Vest effects with girdle combined, are shown on waists for separate wear. There are lovely combinations of silk and crepe, silk and net and lace.

Raglan sleeves with tucks over the shoulder are smart on tailored shirt-waists.

Unless Other Price Is Stated

9987—A New and Pretty Blouse. The yoke fronts are crossed diagonally. The long shoulder forms part of the sleeve, which is lengthened by a set-in portion that may be in wrist or elbow length. The pattern is suitable for silk, voile, ratine, eponge, batiste, linen or lawn.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires two and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1118—A Pretty Cap, and a Becoming Bonnet. For the cap, embroidered lawn, batiste or linen would serve, or silk, cloth, velvet or corduroy. For the bonnet, faille silk, messaline, crepe de chine, velvet or corduroy.

Cut in two sizes for children, one to two, and three to four years. It requires five eighths yard of 24-inch material for either style.

1131—Vestee, Collars and Cuffs for Ladies. The vestee (No. 1) in linen, lawn, organdie, pique or crepe, is appropriate for waist or coat suit. The broad collar (No. 2), is very effective in batiste with a border facing of contrasting material. The flaring collar (No. 3), is also good for linen, velvet, or crepe, as well as organdie, crepe de chine and silk. For the cuffs, silk, velvet, poplin, linen, pique and similar materials may be employed.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires for No. 1 five eighths yard of 18-inch material, for No. 2, three eighths yard of 20-inch material, for No. 3, one quarter yard of 27-inch material, and one half yard for one pair of cuffs, of 20-inch material for a medium size.

8367—Child's Set of Short Clothes. The models here illustrated are practical and adaptable. The drawers are cut in one piece. The petticoat is joined to a waist that is also in one piece, and which may also be used as a pattern for the waist to which the drawers are to be buttoned. The little sacque to be made of cashmere, outing or French flannel. The designs illustrated are all included in this pattern.

Cut in three sizes; one half, one and two years. The two-year size will require for the dress of lawn or similar material 36 inches wide, two and one quater yards. The petticoat, one and three eighths yards of cambric or muslin, 36 inches wide. The sacque, one and one eighth yard of 36-inch material, and the drawers three quarters yard of cambric or muslin 36 inches wide.

1128—Ladies' Dart-fitted Apron. This attractive apron model is dartfitted and has side, front and shoulder seams. It is suitable for percale, lawn, cambric, drill, sateen, gingham or muslin. The neck is cut low and the armscye deep and comfortable.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large, and requires three and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

9930—Girls' Apron. For home, cooking school, for playtime, this design will prove very satisfactory.

Cut in five sizes; four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two and one eighth yards of 27-inch material for a six-year size.

9828—Ladies' Dressing or House Sack. This model may be used for cashmere, lawn, percale, silk, dimity, crepe or flannelette with any suitable trimming. The sack portions are lengthened by skirt or peplum parts and the fronts are crossed deep in closing. The collar is very effective.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires four and one half yards of 24-inch material for a 36-inch size.

9794—Boys' Blouse Suit with Straight Trousers. The model is good for madras, gingham, galatea, linen, linene, serge, velvet, or corduroy.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for an eight-year size.

9678—A Practical Play Dress. Galatea, kindergarten cloth, linen, linene, percale, gingham or khaki cloth may be used for this design. The sleeve may be finished with a band cuff or in shorter length as illustrated.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires two and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

9571—Girls' Underwaist, Bloomers and Petticoat. The waist may be made of cambric, or muslin, the petticoat of cambric, lawn or nainsook, and the bloomers of gingham, sateen, cashmere or brilliantine. The bloomers or skirt may be joined to the waist, or finished separately.

Cut in six sizes; two, four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. For the eight-year size it will require one and three quarters yards for the petticoat, one and one half yards for the bloomers and one yard for the waist, of 36-inch material.

9999—Ladies' House Dress with Long or Short Sleeve. For utility, comfort and convenience, this design has much to recommend it. It closes in coat style, with the entire fronts overlapping. This assures easy and practical adjustment. The pattern is good for gingham, percale, lawn, seersucker, soisette, madras, dimity, drill or linen.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

8688—Set of Baby's One-piece Long Clothes with Front Closing. Including a wrapper, sacque, barra coat and slip. The body portions of the garments are cut in one piece, and the front closings, particularly on slip and barra coat, will save baby from much discomfort and inconvenience in dressing. Cambric, long cloth, nainsook or lawn may be used for the slip, and flannel or flannelette for barra coat, wrapper or sacque.

It will require three quarters yard of 27-inch material for sacque, two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for slip, two and three quarters yards of 27-inch material for wrapper; one and one eighth yards of 40-inch material for barra coat.

9695—Ladies' Dress with Tunic Skirt. The design is suitable for serge, prunella, silk, wash fabrics, cloth or velvet. A deep collar trims the front. The long shoulder forms part of the dart-fitted sleeve.

Cut in six sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust measure. It requires five and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1139—A Simple Frock for Mother's Girl. The waist portions are cut in one with the sleeves, and these may be in short or wrist length. The skirt is a three-piece model with a lap tuck at the center back. The pattern is splendid for all wash materials, such as galatea, kindergarten cloth, poplin, percale, gingham, seersucker and chambrey. Also for velvet, silk, cloth or novelty woolens.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for an eight-year size.

9960—Ladies' House Dress with Long or Short Sleeve. This design has narrow yoke portions joined to a blouse waist, that is shaped at the right front. The skirt is a six-piece model with front and back panels.

HARTMAN FURNITURE AND CARPET CO., 3964 Wentworth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Edna's Secret Marriage

scapegrace, forgot everything, the children, even himself, and sat looking abstractedly upward, with his hand in the tiny paws of a child who was intently examining his rings, with two boys dragging at his legs and another trying on his hat.

Then he recovered himself, regained his hat, drew his jewelry out of danger, and with a benedictory pat on the head to the nearest mite, dropped from the wall—with what intention he scarcely knew, excepting perhaps that of getting a nearer view of the sweet, charmful vision.

But by the time he had brushed the dust from his clothes, and made a step toward the house, the balcony was empty—the girl had vanished.

Sir Cyril pulled his great mustache with so palpable an expression of disappointment, that the little schoolmistress smiled, and by that smile gave Sir Cyril an idea.

He returned to the wall to the extent of leaning on it, and, in execrable French, complimented the teacher upon the appearance and manner of her charges, then said it was a fine and warm day; and then, in worse French still, requested to be informed who the young lady on the balcony might be.

The schoolmistress smiled and shrugged her shoulders. She was sorry she could not inform the gentleman; the young lady was a young English demoiselle staying at the house—had been staying there for a week—she was very fond of children, as monsieur seemed to be; and often stood upon the balcony to watch them; sometimes made them little presents, and——

At that moment the young lady appeared again, this time with a small basket in her hand.

Sir Cyril stood quite still, almost hidden by the wall, and waited in silent curiosity.

The girl bent over the balcony, thereby displaying, unconsciously, her neck and golden-hued head to the most graceful advantage, and a short colloquy with the schoolmistress ensued; then she stretched over one arm and lowered the basket, the schoolmistress running out of the gate, standing on tiptoe to reach it, and falling back unsuccessful with much pleasant laughter.

"Stop," said the girl on the balcony, with a low, musical laugh, which moved Sir Cyril as her face had done; "I'll get a piece of string and let it down."

But here Sir Cyril saw his golden opportunity, and seized it.

With two strides he stood under the balcony, and looked up, bareheaded.

"Will you allow me to help you? I can reach it easily."

The clear, dark eyes looked down upon him with a serene, if slightly surprised, gaze, as if weighing the question of his capability of doing what he had offered, and then, with a quiet, simple "Thank you," the white hand was downreached with the basket.

Sir Cyril secured it, handed it over to the schoolmistress, and then looked up again.

"You are very fond of children, I see," he said.

The girl, who had been so absorbed by watching the progress of her basket of cakes and sweetmeats among the children so as to have forgotten him, turned her head slowly.

"Yes; and you also, I perceive," she added, with a shadow of a smile.

Sir Cyril laughed.

"I did not know that I had an audience, or the performance would have been shorter."

The dark eyes were opened a little wider with slight surprise.

"Why are you ashamed? Most Englishmen are fond of children. I knew you were English, you see."

"You would have learned that just now, all the more quickly if you had heard my French," said he, responding with a smile. "You are English, are you not?"

A week, a day ago, Sir Cyril would not have stopped to consider whether this question was bold or not; and now, after he had uttered it, looking up at the calm, sweet face, it seemed abrupt, rude, almost impertinent.

"Yes, I am English," she replied, "but I have not been to England for a very long time; I do not remember it;" and she looked across the lake—which she could see, although Sir Cyril could not—and up the great mountain Pilatus, with a strange little wistful look. For a moment again she seemed to have forgotten him, then she looked down again. "You have just come from England?"

"Yes," said Sir Cyril.

The dark eyes regarded him for the first time with something like interest and curiosity. "I wonder why—I mean, I wonder how you could leave it. I think that I could never have left it of my own free will."

Sir Cyril kept down his astonishment at this strange, candid, unsophisticated declaration, and said quietly—very quietly—for he was tormented by the fear each moment that this beautiful, grave, childlike creature would grow shy, take fright like a bird, and fly away.

"And yet this is very beautiful, all this—Switzerland, Italy, and so on."

"Yes, very, is it not?" she responded, with a slight inclination of the head. "Oh, yes, very beautiful; oh, yes, is not this beautiful;" and she waved her hand slightly toward the scene stretched out before her. Sir Cyril glanced at the hills for half a second, and gave a whole one to the small white hand and delicate wrist.

"I should soon grow tired of looking at it if it were in England. Have you seen the sunset?—look at that little fellow." She looked up suddenly, her eyes lighting up with a tender and amused smile as they rested on the children. "Do you see, he has given half his cake to that little mite sitting on the stone; and yet they say that children are selfish!"

Sir Cyril hunted about for something to say to prolong the conversation in any way, but before he had found anything to say, the cathedral clock struck, the supple figure of the girl straightened itself; bending forward, she called to the schoolmistress:

"Will you give me the basket this afternoon?" and was about to turn into the house, when, evidently remembering the stranger, she leaned a little over the railing, with a slight bow and a "good morning," and disappeared.

Sir Cyril hastily uncovered, returned the parting words, and with a little shake—just such a one as a Newfoundland gives when he emerges from a swim—he strode slowly away.

He turned once, as he descended the hill, and, looking back at the house, with its broad gutters and carved balconies, its quaint windows and broad green shutters, saw the word "Pension," written in gold, on a board over the front windows.

Sir Cyril, as ignorant as Englishmen of his class generally are of all matters of Continental life, was extremely puzzled.

"Great Heaven!" he ejaculated. "Pension! That can't have meant anything in the way of almshouses—she is—isn't a sort of Greenwich pensioner!" and so, puzzled, and interested more than he would liked to have confessed, he got down to the lake.

Strangely enough the view seemed suddenly to have grown in beauty; for the first time it struck him that the great solemn range of mountains had something grand and different to Pall Mall about them. For the first time, also, he remembered, he had not noticed it while he had been listening to and looking at her, that the girl with the sweet childlike face had worn a white muslin, with a little touch of dark crimson—a rose or ribbon, perhaps—at her throat. And so he walked back to the house; and, by way of a refresher or awakener, he could scarcely have distinguished which, he ordered a brandy and soda.

But the figure in white muslin and the little bunch of crimson would not be dispelled; and when the afternoon sun had sunk a little behind the hills, he thought, having nothing better to do, that he would just take a walk round the cathedral and see how the cakes and sweetmeats had agreed with the children. You see he was very fond of children.

CHAPTER II.

WHITE MUSLIN.

Once or twice, as he climbed the hill, Sir Cyril realized the real object of his afternoon walk; and when he did so, he felt decidedly uncomfortable. It appeared to him as if he had changed places with some one else. Could it be possible that he who had run through twelve seasons without a scratch had succumbed to a pair of dark, serene eyes and a white muslin frock?

"Of course, it's absurd," he mused, half shamefacedly. "It's this confounded slow place that has been too much for me. It must have been the muslin; and yet there was a look in the girl's face that, if I never see her again, I shan't forget. Ah! One season in town will change all that—more's the pity."

Then he came in sight of the house and was half relieved to find the balcony empty—worse than empty—for an old lady with an obvious "front" and an old-fashioned gray silk dress, was seated knitting there. Sir Cyril laughed, lit his cigar and passed on. The playground was still, likewise, and somehow the whole place seemed altered.

"Beastly old place," he muttered; "I'm sick of it already; I'll go on tomorrow morning."

Then, just for his own satisfaction, he determined to continue his walk, though the real object of it had been missed, and he turned off to the right down a lane that was certainly pretty enough to repay him for greater trouble. He walked on for some time, and was just thinking of turning when he caught sight of something white in the distance. It might have been a cow, or clothes hanging out to dry, but somehow Sir Cyril decided at once that it was a white muslin and quickened his step. At the end of the lane, just where it sloped toward a valley, was a single block of stone that had fallen from some mason's cart, and on it was seated the girl he had seen in the morning.

She was bending slightly forward, her hands clasped on an open book, her eyes fixed on the snow-capped mountains, and so lost in serene, childlike meditation, that Sir Cyril—to whom bashfulness was a sensation unknown—paused for half a moment, half decided to turn back after all.

But the girl's ears were quick, as well as small and pretty, and as he stopped short the sudden cessation of his footfall aroused her.

She looked around and bestowed upon him a half smile of recognition.

Sir Cyril wanted nothing more—though nothing less like encouragement could be imagined. He raised his hat, and in another moment was standing beside her with the usual greeting.

She returned it with the same calm unembarrassed manner that had surprised and attracted him in the morning, and quietly waited for him to commence a conversation or go on with his walk.

"We seem fated to meet," he said, sublimely forgetful of the object of his walk. "Is this a favorite resting place of yours?"

"Yes," she said, without raising her eyes. "Have you not been here before?"

"No," he said.

"Ah," she remarked, "this is not one of the show places, and yet you get a better view here than from many of the better-known points. I found it out for myself."

"It was a happy discovery," he said. "It is just the place for one to come and dream in."

"Yes," she said.

Then she looked at his face, and away again, with a smile; and Sir Cyril knew, as well as if she had said it, that she thought he was not given to dreaming.

Sir Cyril, looking down upon her from his six feet of manhood, thought he had never seen a sweeter thing than the little, grave half smile which curved her dainty lips and brought down the long, dark lashes upon the smooth cheeks.

He could have looked at her for an hour in silence, for he had suddenly discovered that he had a great appreciation of the beautiful; but that could not be, so he hazarded another remark:

"You will see nothing so fair as this in your beloved England, I'm afraid."

"No, perhaps not," she replied. "I shall not care; it is England, bad or good, pretty or ugly, that I love."

Sir Cyril slipped down gently upon the grass, and covered the movement by a quick response:

"It is a thousand pities that you should have been kept from it so long."

"Yes, is it not?" she assented, with simple candor. "I have dreamed of it since I was a little girl so high;" and she put out one hand, as people do when they are speaking of their childhood, about a foot from the ground. "You—are you going back soon?"

Sir Cyril hesitated.

"I am not quite sure—I have not any decided plans. Perhaps not yet a while. Are you?"

"Not for another month, I am sorry to say," she said, with a little sigh.

Sir Cyril wondered what was the stumbling blocks—perhaps a disagreeable papa, or an invalid mamma? He chanced it.

"I hope none of your people are ill here—that is," he added, as the dark eyes met his with a slight expression of surprise and amusement—"that is, if the expression of such a hope on my part is not an impertinence."

"Oh, no," she said, "my people are quite well. I smiled at hearing Aunt Martha classed as plural; she is the only 'people' I have."

"Your father and mother——" said straightforward Sir Cyril, then stopped abruptly.

"Are both dead," said the girl, in a low, but quite firm, voice. "I have only Aunt Martha, and Aunt Martha has only me; and sometimes," she added, "I think I am almost too many for her." And then there came a musical ripple that positively startled Sir Cyril. So childish, so full of unalloyed and natural merriment was it, that for the life of him he could not help a gruff bass echo.

The sound of his voice recalled the girl. "Aunt Martha and I was waiting for the first of September."

"The first of September," said Sir Cyril, wondering how on earth partridges could concern two women.

"Yes; we start then for England, and we must not go a day before or a day afterward."

"Why not?" exclaimed Sir Cyril, raising his head from the reclining position in which he had been, with extreme surprise and curiosity.

The girl, with her eyes upon the snow peaks, answered quietly, almost dreamily, with that same look of having forgotten her companion:

"Because my father wished it; because he left it as a dying request, and commanded that I should do so."

The answer, so calmly and candidly given, was so characteristic of the childlike faith and confidence of her every word and gesture, that it was robbed of much of the strangeness and improbability which it wears when set down on paper.

Sir Cyril felt not a bit surprised by the confiding candor—he only felt a queer sensation of pity, and a desire to protect this simple-minded, pure-hearted child-woman from herself.

He changed the subject, though he was full of curiosity to hear more of her story from the sweet young lips.

"Your little favorites have all gone home, I suppose?"

She nodded absently, and then turned her eyes upon him reflectingly. "You came from London?"

"Yes," said Cyril.

"Perhaps you know London well?"

"Pretty well—too well," he replied with a laugh.

A little eager light came into her eyes.

"You know some of the lawyers, perhaps. Do you know one named Burdon—Richard, Grey's Inn?"

Sir Cyril raised himself on his elbow, and was about to reply:

"Why he is my own lawyer!" but a something, an indefinable something, drove the answer from his lips, and in place of it he said, "Yes, I know the name; I know the man."

"What sort of man is he?" she asked. "Is he a young or an old—but I know he must be old, for he was my father's friend."

"Yes, Burdon is an elderly man," said Cyril.

"Is he a good—an honest man?" she asked, her clear eyes fixed on his face.

"Good!" said Cyril, with a smile. "Scarcely the term by which to qualify a lawyer; honest—as lawyers go—yes, very," he added, seeing that the lightness of his reply had in some way annoyed or distressed her, for the clear eyes had clouded, as a child's does when it is displeased, or dissatisfied.

"Yes, decidedly honest, I should say. You only know him by name?"

"Only by name," she assented. "He was my father's lawyer, and on his deathbed my father charged me to go to him on this first of September that we are now coming to, and receive some papers which are to change my whole life. Is there any wonder that I am curious?"

"None at all," said Cyril; then there was a moment's silence.

"And Burdon; does he expect you?"

"Yes," she replied; "my father had written to him—or they had arranged that I should go, if—if—my father could not. So that he expects me."

"He does not know you?" asked Sir Cyril, interested more than he could say.

"No; he expects to see a Miss Weston—Edna Weston, that is my name—and that is all."

Cyril remained silent for a moment.

"It is a strange story," he said, more to himself than to her, but the words reached her, and for the first time there was a look of slight embarrassment in her eyes, a dash of color in her face; both heightened her beauty.

"Yes, and you think that I should not tell it to you! Perhaps it was wrong," she added to herself, with a little troubled look; "but you see I am almost always thinking of it—it is not wonderful that I should be—and it came natural to ask you, an Englishman, who knew London. I hope I have not done wrong!"

Cyril looked up, with something like a flush on his handsome face.

"My dear child—young lady, I mean," he corrected himself, "this stuck," and he held up his cane, "will not be more dumb than I shall be——"

She interrupted him with a smile.

"I am sure of that," she said, softly; "but there is no need for secrecy, that I know of; you see I know nothing myself, and there is no harm in saying that I shall be at a certain place on a certain day!"

Sir Cyril nodded. The cathedral clock struck seven.

The girl pulled out a tiny gold watch, and rose with some haste.

"Seven o'clock! They will have begun tea at the pension!"

At the strange word Sir Cyril's doubts and speculations arose again.

Tea at seven o'clock! Then, perhaps, after all, she was a pensioner, or her aunt lived in an almshouse.

Almost unconsciously he repeated the words:

"At—the—pension."

She turned her laughing eyes upon him.

"Yes—how puzzled you look! Ah! I see you dine instead of drinking tea at this hour?"

"Yes, generally," admitted Cyril. "But," he added, "I was puzzled over the word 'pension.' Does your aunt live in an almshouse?"

She, in her turn, looked puzzled, then once more the musical laugh rang softly out.

"Almshouse! Oh, if Aunt Martha could only have heard you! Don't you know what a pension is?"

"No," said Sir Cyril, penitently, "I must confess I don't! Pray don't estimate the intelligence of all Englishmen by my standard. You'll travel all through the United Kingdom before you find a more ignorant man!"

"Shall I?" she said, laughing. "Well, I'll inform you on the point at least; a pension is a Swiss—or a French or German, for that matter—boarding house, where for the consideration of so many shillings—or frances—per week, travelers, especially unprotected ones like Aunt Martha and I, are lodged and fed."

Cyril laughed.

"What an idiot I am!—of course! And do you all—all the people staying at the house—feed—I mean, have your meals together?"

"Yes," she said—they were both standing by this time. "The breakfast bell—everything is done by bell-ringing—rings at nine for breakfast, and we all come out of our rooms like the old man and woman in the barometer, and sit at a long table to coffee, fresh butter, rolls and eggs; then the bell rings at one and we get our dinner—and a very good dinner, too!—and at seven we get what Aunt Martha calls 'a meat tea'! All quite in the Swiss style."

"It sounds very nice," said Sir Cyril. "I'm not quite comfortable at the hotel down below," he added, quietly, as the splendor of the Grand's appointments and the perfection of the chef's dishes rose before him—"not quite comfortable, you know; do you think they've room at your place to take me?"

"Oh, yes!" she answered, innocently, "some people went away yesterday, and you could have their rooms—they were very nice rooms, with a balcony."

"I'm very fond of a balcony," said Sir Cyril.

"But, perhaps," she resumed, doubtfully, "you might find that you had made a change for the worse. What hotel are you staying at?"

"One of them down there," said Cyril, jerking his head in the direction of the town, and not daring to mention the Grand, for she, innocent and unsophisticated as she was, would know too much of the Grand's fame to be deceived.

"Well, perhaps you would be comfortable—at least, it has one recommendation, it is very cheap; but, perhaps," she added, glancing at him critically for the first time, and recognizing instinctively the aristocratic elegance of Poole's cut and Hancock's jewelry, "perhaps that would be no recommendation to you."

"On the contrary," said Cyril with grim sincerity, "it is the best of all recommendations—oh, I assure you it is of the greatest importance."

"Well, then, I should say you had better try it." And though it was just the speech that Cyril wanted, it rather upset him by its matter-of-fact straightforwardness; if she had wanted him to come very much, for her own sake just a little, she would not have been so emphatic.

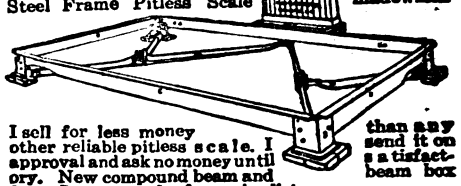
The scapegrace felt disappointed.

"Thank you, I think I'll call upon the proprietor, or proprietress, this evening, and see if they will accept me as a member of the family. I hope they will!"

"I hope so, too," she said, with the half smile; and then, with a little graceful inclination of the stately head, she wished him "Good evening."

Cyril sat down again when she had gone, and stroked his mustache with the manner and look which his friends declared he always wore when he was more than ordinarily puzzled or confused.

"Cyril, my poor boy," he muttered, staring at his hat, which he had not yet replaced on his head, "you certainly are bewitched, and by a little girl, barely out of the schoolroom, and with a pair of dark eyes and a muslin frock! Yes, and who evidently looks upon you as a middle-aged party—a sort of elderly uncle or young grandfather—a convenient recipient of her confidences, and as something to laugh at. Yes, by Jove, she looks at me so straightforward as if I were an old woman, or an intelligent retriever! Great Heaven, how the place must have aged me! Perhaps, like Rip Van Winkle, I shall wake up and find I am gray-headed and rheumatic about the joints. And the marvel of it is!" he continued, striking a match spitefully, "that instead of resenting such treatment; instead of turning away with disgust at such unnatural coldness and want of appreciation, I rather like it—that is to say, I'm bewildered, persecuted by it; that I feel like a great schoolboy fumed and writhing under his first love affair!"



"And now!" he muttered, as he paced down the hill, "I suppose I shall be mad enough to give up my rooms at the Grand for some half-furnished attic in this confounded pension; throw up the eight o'clock dinner, with the clear soup and the capital veal cutlets and cabbage a la Suisse. Yes, I can see it come clearly. I can't resist! I'm persecuted! In fact, I'm stark, staring mad, and somebody ought to come out and take me back to Colony Hatch!"

FOSTER MOTHERS TO ORPHANS.—Vassar College students have formed a foster mother society to adopt an orphan. The title of "The Daddy Long-legs Society" has been adopted, and the movement is expected to make such strides that soon other women's colleges will join. Already, Jackson College has taken this up and if a plan proposed is carried out, students will become foster mothers of waifs who otherwise might never have homes. The classes are to adopt homeless children as class babies, and find homes for them among relatives of the students. "The girls would get some benefit from the plan," said Miss Greenwood, president of the senior class, "for besides creating a certain amount of college spirit it would give the girls an insight into social service work which many plan to take up as a life work."

Comfort Sisters' Corner

Miss Rachel Kellun's strong words against the man who drinks, and I could keep silent no longer.

Dear sisters, do not denounce all boys and men who drink as unworthy. All do not drink of their own accord. How many young men would gladly, if they only could do so, give up drink forever! Remember there is such a thing as inheriting the drinking habit. Those boys are not to blame because they drink. Then too, some boys are not given the proper teaching in their childhood. Why blame the poor fellows for what is not their fault, but their misfortune? I am not advising any girl to marry a man who drinks, with the hope of reforming him. Rather reform him and then marry him. But, dear sisters, do not, I beg of you, scorn all boys who drink. I know several boys who drink and I know from experience, that if you turn from those boys and have nothing to do with them, it makes them worse. If, on the contrary, you let those boys know that you like them and that it hurts (not angers) and saddens you to see them under the influence of liquor, they are caused to feel ashamed of themselves and to desire to give up drink. If you scold and become angry with any man or boy about this subject, you will always find that it makes him ten times as bad as he was before. And, dear sisters, all men cannot give up drink if they try. I know of one dear, good man, one of the best friends I ever had, who tried all his lifetime to give up drink. He prayed and fought against it in vain, and I am sure he was glad when he was allowed to give up the struggle and go to God.

It does not anger me to see persons, even those of whom I know not even the name, under the influence of liquor. It saddens me as I think of what that man's or that boy's life must be, of the sufferings of his wife or mother and I feel that I would like to beg him for her sake to give up drink. Let us hear from the other sisters on this subject. I have often seen letters in which boys who drink were denounced as unworthy of love and affection; but I don't believe I have ever seen one in which the writer showed his or her sympathy for that boy.

Perhaps when I tell you that I am only a young girl of nineteen you will say I am one of those "romantic" persons who in youth believe that the whole world can be reformed. I am not that sort of girl, but I do believe that sympathy and love do more to reform the world than scorn and hatred.

Hoping to hear from other sisters, both through COMFORT and personally, I am an ardent COMFORT sister,

MISS MARIE P. KEARNEY.

Miss Kearney. If, as you say, the drink habit is inherited, then, surely no girl should marry a drinking man and inflict the inherited curse on her children, even if she is willing to chance the horrors of being a drunkard's wife.—Ed.

CAZENOVIA, N. Y.

DEAR SISTERS:

It has been so long since I have written, that I am sure you have all forgotten me. However, I am going to write again, and renew our acquaintance.

I have been very busy during the past year, preparing to do mission work. I am particularly interested in rescue mission work in our own country. I thoroughly believe in foreign missions, but I believe that mission work should begin at one's own door—in one's own city and state; and of course extend to the remote corners of the earth. It will do that anyway, if we begin the work well at home. And I believe in an undenominational work. I do not think it matters so much whether we travel the Christian road by the Baptist or Methodist or Presbyterian route, so long as we are real genuine Christians. Of course I belong to one of these churches; I think a Christian will usually want to belong to a church. But we are all "brethren" whether Presbyterians or Lutherans or Congregationalists or any of the many other denominations.

Just now I am engaged in a Sunshine work—the establishing of a Sunshine Home. Of course that means, among other things, the raising of funds; and one way we are doing this is by the sale of our Sunshine postcards. We publish the cards, and get as many children as we can to sell them for us. Of course this is not a "get-rich-quick scheme," when you realize that we only make a few cents on each dozen cards. But if we can only get enough children to help us, it amounts to quite a little when all put together.

But perhaps I have written enough along this line for one letter. I don't want you to think I am a "crank" who can think of nothing but my own work and interests.

I think I described my home and vicinity in a former letter, but you have probably read so many sisters' letters, between then and now that you have forgotten all about it, so I will say that central New York is one of the most beautiful spots in the whole country: especially in autumn when the foliage is bright with its red and yellow. Then the hills and valleys, the gorges and ravines are gorgeous.

My correspondence is very great, but if the sisters are interested in my work, I will be glad to tell them more about it if they will enclose a stamp when writing. I would especially like to hear from the school teachers and also the Sunday school teachers and junior workers. And I should like to ask all the sisters to pray for the success of our work. The prayers of our friends mean a great deal to us in this work.

May God bless you all.

With kindest wishes to all the sisters,

Very sincerely, RUTH F. KNAPP.

Ruth Knapp. No one could possibly accuse you of thinking wholly of your own work and interests, and I hope you meet with the success your endeavors deserve. A church I knew of netted a fairly good sum by giving five or ten cents to every junior member with the request to "make it grow." Much good-natured rivalry existed and the ways and means devised were, in many cases, amusing. One girl, whose special talent lay in candy making, bought supplies and made candy which she sold, buying a larger quantity of supplies next time and so on, till she realized a good profit. Another girl made fancy boxes and flowers of crepe paper, while still another invested her ten cents in dainty material for sweeping caps for which she found a ready sale, buying material for more caps from the proceeds of her first sale. The boys too, were willing workers. Still another church realized a fair profit by the sale of souvenir post-cards of the church and pastor. It will greatly facilitate matters if the church or community boasts one or more amateur photographers, as it probably does since the work is so interesting and easy to say nothing of being such a financial success. Then there is always the "birthday box" wherein members put as much money, usually one cent pieces, as they are years old. Sometimes this is made the occasion for a social gathering at some member's home. While I do not claim these to be original methods, perhaps they will serve the purpose and in the meantime, we'll hope for more ideas from some of our church workers.—Ed.

ORCUTT, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for some time and I enjoy the Sisters' Corner.

We have lived in Sunny California over four years; one year near beautiful Santa Barbara, and right on the coast; one and one half years in the mountains and near the big trees of Mariposa county; one and one half years here in the oil fields, where thousands of barrels of oil are taken out of the depths of the earth each day.

If one has never seen the oil fields it is quite a sight. We live near the gasoline plant, where six large Bessemer engines convert crude oil or gas into gasoline. The city of Santa Barbara and surrounding country all along the coast is beautiful, but here it's nothing but rocky hills and dust, which makes it rather disagreeable; but we can't have all the good things at once. Here one has employment at very good wages, all the natural gas we can burn, also free water and have our own tents or cabins, so our expenses are not great. We have our own home in the beautiful city of Portland, Oregon, so we won't be here always.

I have one son twenty-one years of age. I had one dear little baby girl, that God saw best to take from this world of care. She would be a young lady now and I dream of her quite often, but never wish her back, but cling to my boy as all mothers should. I think our boys just as dear as our girls and they love to have "mother" praise their efforts to do things, make a confident of them, and to make pretty things for their rooms, as girls do. Don't you? My boy was home on a visit a month this summer, and I made him a nice pincushion for his tie pins and a tie holder, and he was so proud of them. He is in San Francisco, a big wicked city; but I trust him to God's care and pray for him every night and write him long encouraging letters each week to help him along.

I will tell a good and simple blood purifier, one third each of Epsom salts, sulphur and cream of tartar, mix well, take a teaspoonful three times daily.

I will come again and tell you all about the West, as I have lived in Washington, Oregon and California.

Long live Mrs. Wilkinson, Uncle Charlie, Cousin Marion and Billy the Goat. Best wishes to all COMFORT sisters, MRS. MAE LODER.

Mrs. Loder. Your letter may act as an eye opener to mothers who are relegating their sons to a secondary place in the home, for I am sorry to say that is just what so many unthinking women are doing. Such mothers are the means of providing inmates for reform schools and yes, even prisons, simply because they render the home life of the boy so unpleasant that he prefers the street, with its inevitable outcome, to it. Some of you may lift your hands in holy horror at the suggestion and say that no boy could be treated any better than your boy and I am not denying the truth of that—in a certain sense. To be sure, you provide sufficient food for him, dress him according to his needs and allow him time and opportunity for study, but he needs more than that, he needs your companionship and guidance to lead him aright, though not in such a way that he will realize he is being led. Make his pleasure and interests your study and help him entertain his friends in the home, no matter if their heavy shoes leave tracks on the carpet and a cherished chair receive a scratch or two; rather pride yourself on possessing a mind above such petty things and look only at the future good you are accomplishing. If he has any particular hobby or study, encourage him in it, even if it does mean the expenditure of more money than you would deem wise at first thought. Ask yourself how much your boy is worth to you and then if you will let a few paltry dollars stand in the way you do not deserve the holy name of "Mother." It will be necessary to study your boy for his individual needs, but the main point to be considered is the making of home life so attractive that he will not need to seek amusement elsewhere.—Ed.

FORT SMITH, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been getting so much out of your letters and advice that I want to write and tell you I appreciate it all. I have read COMFORT for twenty-five years and have always loved it.

We have lived in Arkansas six years. I think the climate here ideal and nowhere I believe will one find finer natural scenery, mountains, views and valleys, nor better roads than in this part of Arkansas. All kinds of berries, peaches, pears, apples, plums and apricots grow to their best here and almost every kind of vegetable, two crops of which may be grown each year. Cotton is grown extensively and rice is grown in the central and eastern part of the state.

Fort Smith is a manufacturing city of twenty-three thousand population, fine schools, etc. and has the largest sorghum factory in the world. Fort Smith was what its name indicates, a fort during the Civil War and a few of the buildings of that time are still in preservation for their historical value, such as the Commissary building and Officers' Barracks, etc., all built of stone, now covered with ivy.

I so much admire Miss Lillie Davis' courage in trying to do something worth while, even though afflicted with deafness.

We all ought to strive to do more for others, be cheerful and at least give a pleasant greeting and kind words to all we encounter. I have a very pleasant memory of a dear neighbor I had in the North, who has now been a "shut-in" for twenty-one years. To go into her presence was like going into a room filled with sunshine on a dreary day. Contact with such persons leaves one with a very different feeling compared with those who are chronic grumblers, and throwers of wet blankets.

We have three children, one boy of sixteen years, another five and one half years and a baby girl of ten months.

We are now living in the extreme suburbs, having bought an acreage tract, and keep a horse, cow and chickens. It is so restful to live out this way and more healthful.

Trusting I have not made my first call too lengthy and that I may come again some time I remain with best wishes for all, your sister.

MRS. S. E. WITHEY.

SPRUCE, MICH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Mrs. Baker. I too was a stepmother at the age of nineteen to two boys and a girl and at twenty-one I was blessed with a child of my own and have tried to show no favoritism. I had their mother's picture enlarged and always told them it was their first mamma and that I was their second mamma: the word "stepmother" never passed their lips. I loved them and they returned that love. You will often find people who meddle with them, asking them if you are good to them and similar questions, but if you are kind to them they will stand up for you. Now that I am old and gray they still call me "mamma."

May this be an inspiration to you in your undertaking. Respectfully, MRS. EVA CORFMAN.

BRYAN, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for quite a while and have never written before but feel that I must reply to Mrs. Rosa E. Baker's letter which was printed in October COMFORT. I, too, am a stepmother, and can certainly sympathize with any stepmother. Why is it, I wonder, that the stepmother is pictured as she is? Of course there are good and bad ones, but I believe the former will outnumber the latter.
